Purport and purpose of the prayer:—that the God of our Lord Jesus Christ (see on ver. 3. The appellation is here solemnly and most appropriately given, as leading on to what is about to be said in vv. 20 ff. of God’s exaltation of Christ to be Head over all things to His Church. To His God, Christ also in the days of His flesh prayed, “Father, glorify thy Son:” and even more markedly in that last cry, “My God, my God”), the Father of Glory (not merely the author, or source, of glory: but

God is the Father,—by being the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,—of that glory, the true and all-including glory, and only glory, of the Godhead, which shone forth in the Manhood of the only-begotten Son (John i. 14),—the true Shechinah, which His saints beheld in the face of Christ, 2 Cor. iv. 4, 6, and into which they are changed by the Lord the Spirit, ib. iii. 18. In fact, 2 Cor. iii. 7—iv. 6, is the key to this sublime expression), would give unto you the Spirit (certainly it would not be right to take the word here as signifying solely the Holy Spirit, nor solely the spirit of man: rather is it the complex idea, of the spirit of man indwelt by the Spirit of God, so that as such, it is His special gift; see below) of wisdom (not, which gives wisdom, but which possesses it as its character; to which appertains wisdom) and of revelation (i.e. that revelation which belongs to all Christians: see 1 Cor. ii. 10 ff.: not the spiritual gifts of the early Church;—nor could the Apostle be alluding to any thing so trivial and fleeting, see 1 Cor. xiii. xiv. To those who are taught of God’s Spirit, ever more and more of His glories in Christ are revealed, see John xvi. 14, 15) in (belongs to would give: as the element and sphere of the working of this gift of the Spirit) full knowledge (not knowledge only, but knowledge full and complete: see 1 Cor. xiii. 12) of Him: (of Him refers to the Father,—not to Christ, as some think; compare “his” four times in vv. 18, 19: Christ first becomes thus designated in ver. 20), having the eyes of your heart enlightened (the expression eyes of your heart is somewhat unusual. The word “heart” in Scripture signifies the very core and centre of life, where the intelligence has its post of observation, where the stores of experience are laid up, and the thoughts have their fountain. Thus the eyes of the heart would be those pointed at in Matt. vi. 22, 23,—that inner eye of the heart, through which light is poured in on its own purposes and motives, and it looks out on, and perceives, and judges things spiritual: the eye, as in nature, being both receptive and contemplative of the light); that you may know (purpose of the enlightening) what is the hope (i. e. the nature of the hope itself, involving also of course the nature of the thing hoped for, which gives its whole complexion to the hope) of (belonging to, see on ch. iv. 4) His calling (i. e. the calling wherewith he called us. All the matters mentioned, the calling, the inheritance, the power, are His,—but not all in the same sense: see below. On calling, see notes, Rom. viii. 28—30), what the riches of the glory of His inheritance (“what a rich, sublime cumulation, setting forth in like terms the weightiness of the matters described!” Meyer. See Col. i. 27) in (in the case, as exemplified in; not so weak as ‘among,’—nor merely ‘in,’ so as to refer to its subjective realization in them) the saints (join together “His inheritance in the saints;”—that inheritance of His, the subjects of which, as its inheritors, are the saints), <sup>19</sup> and what the surpassing greatness of his power to us-ward who believe (not His future power in the actual resurrection only is spoken of, but THE WHOLE of His energizing to us-ward from first to last, principally however His present spiritual work, as implied by the present tense, “who [now] believe,” not, as in 2 Thess. i. 10, “that believed:” see also Col. ii. 12, and 1 Pet. i. 3—5. This power is exerted to us-ward, which expression of the A. V. I retain, as giving better the prominence to us in the fact of its direction, than the more usual but tamer ‘toward us’), according to (in proportion to,—as might be expected from: but more than this—His power to us-ward is a part of, a continuation of, or rather included as a consequence in, the other) the working (putting forth in action, in an object) of the might of His strength (His might, the actual measure of His strength. The latter is the attribute, subjectively considered: the former the weight of that attribute, objectively esteemed: the operation, in matter of fact, of the might of that strength), which (viz. working: compare ver. 6, note) He hath wrought in Christ (our firstfruits: nor only this, but our Head, in virtue of God’s working in whom, His power to us-ward is made possible and actual), in that He raised Him from the dead (the resurrection of Christ was not a mere bodily act, an earnest of our bodily resurrection, but was a spiritual act, the raising of His humanity [which is ours], consisting of body and soul, from infirmity to glory, from the curse to the final triumph. In that He died, HE DIED UNTO SIN once; but in that He liveth, HE LIVETH UNTO GOD. And so we who believe, knit to him, have died unto sin and live unto God. It is necessary to the understanding of the following, thoroughly to appreciate this—or we shall be in danger of regarding, with the shallower expositors, Christ’s resurrection as merely a pledge of our bodily resurrection, or as a mere figure representing our spiritual resurrection,—not as involving the resurrection of the Church in both senses), and setting Him at His right hand (see especially Mark xvi. 19) in the heavenly places (see on ver. 3: and Matt. vi. 9, note. let go the verity of Christ's bodily existence, or to explain away the glories of His resurrection into mere spiritualities. As Stephen saw Him, so He veritably is: in human form, locally existent, up above (the word seems to imply, not far above but simply local elevation) all rule (compare Matt. xxviii. 18), and authority, and power, and lordship (the most reasonable account of the four words seems to be this: above all rule gives the highest and fullest expression of exaltation: and authority is added as filling out rule in detail: authority being not only government, but every kind of official power, primary and delegated: compare Matt. viii. 9; x. 1; xxi. 23 ff.; Luke xx. 20; xxiii. 7. Then in the second pair power is mere might, the raw material, so to speak, of authority: lordship is that pre-eminence which power establishes for itself. So that in the first pair we descend from the higher and concentrated to the lower and diffused: in the second we ascend from the lower and diffused to the higher and concentrated. The following shews that in this enumeration not only earthly, nor only heavenly authorities are meant to be included, but both together,—so as to make it perfectly general. That the evil spirits are included, is therefore manifest: see also ch. vi. 12; 1 Cor. xv. 24—26), and every name that is named (further generalization: indicating not merely titles of honour, nor persons, but a transition from the authorities, &c. to all things below: answering to "nor any other creature," in Rom. viii. 39. And this transition passes into still wider meaning in the following words), not only in this present state, but also in that which is to come (compare again Rom. viii. 38—not only time present and to come, but the present [earthly] condition of things, and the future [heavenly] one. And forasmuch as that heavenly state which is for us future, is now, to those in it, present, it is by the easiest transition denoted by "the age to come:" compare Luke xx. 35, and especially Heb. ii. 5, "the world to come." So that the meanings seem combined,—'every name now named in earth and heaven:' and, 'every name which we name,—not only now, but hereafter.' Wesley says, beautifully expanding Bengel: "We know that the king is above all, though we cannot name all the officers of his court. So we know that Christ is above all, though we are not able to name all His subjects": 22.] and subjected all things under His feet (from the Messianic Ps. viii.; not without an allusion also above to Ps. ex. 1), and gave ('presented;' keep the literal sense: not 'appointed;' see below) HIM (emphatic, from its position: HIM, thus exalted, thus glorified, the Father not only raised to this super-eminence, but gave Him to His redeemed as their Head, &c.) as head over all things to the Church (the meaning is thus to be gained, from what follows: CHRIST is Head over all things: the Church is the BODY of Christ, and as such is the fulness of Him who fills all with all: the Head of such a Body, is Head over all things; therefore when God gives Christ as Head to the church, He gives Him as Head over all things to the church, from the necessity of the case. Thus what follows is explanatory of this), which same (Church) is His BODY (not in a figure merely: it is veritably His Body: not that which in our glorified humanity He personally bears, but that in which He, as the Christ of God, is manifested and glorified by spiritual organization. He is its Head, from Him comes its life; in Him, it is exalted: in it, He is lived forth and witnessed to; He possesses nothing for Himself,—neither His communion with the Father, nor His fulness of the Spirit, nor His glorified humanity,—but all for His Church, which is in the innermost reality, HIMSELF; His flesh and His bones—and therefore) the fulness (i. e. ‘the thing filled,’—“the filled up receptacle” [compare ch. ii. 22], as Eadie expresses it; the meaning being, that the church, being the Body of Christ, is dwelt in and filled by God: it is His fulness in an especial manner—His fulness abides in it, and is exemplified by it. The nearest approach to any one word in English which may express it, is made by fulness, though it requires explaining, as importing not the inherent plenitude of God Himself, but that communicated plenitude of gifts and graces wherein He infuses Himself into His Church) of Him that filleth (it is not very easy here to decide whether the word should be thus rendered, or, “that is being filled with.” I have discussed the two in my Greek Test. and adopted that in the text: being further inclined to this rendering by ch. iv. 10, where it is said of Christ, “He that ascended up above all heavens, that He might fill all things,” and the Apostle proceeds to enumerate the various gifts bestowed by Him on His Church. See further in note there) all things (the whole universe: not to be restricted in meaning. The Church is the special receptacle and abiding-place of Him who fills all things) with all things (i. e. who is the bestower of all, wherever found:—with all, not only gifts, not only blessings, but things: who fills all creation with whatever it possesses—who is the Author and Giver of all things. The reference is, I think, to the Father, and not to Christ).

II. 1—22.] (See on ch. i. 3.) COURSE AND PROGRESS OF THE CHURCH THROUGH THE SON; consisting mainly in the receiving of believers in the new man Christ Jesus—setting forth on one side the death and ruin in which they were;—on the other, the way to life opened to them by the finished work of Christ. This throughout the chapter, which is composed (as ch. i.) of two parts—the first, more doctrinal and assertive (vv. 1—10), the second more hortative and reminiscent

(vv. 11—22). In both, the separate cases of Gentiles and Jews, and the present union in Christ, are treated of. And herein

A. 1—10.] THE POWER OF THE FATHER IN QUICKENING US, BOTH GENTILES AND JEWS, IN AND WITH CHRIST (1—6); —HIS PURPOSE IN MANIFESTING THIS POWER (7); —INFERENCE RESPECTING THE METHOD OF OUR SALVATION (8—10).

1, 2.] Actual state of the Gentiles—dead in trespasses and sins, living under the power of the devil.

1.] You also (now, ye are selected and put into prominence, from among the recipients of God’s grace implied in vv. 19—23 of the former chapter. See below), who were (this clearly marks the state in which they were at the time when God quickened them: this in ver. 5 is brought prominently forward) dead (certainly not, as Meyer, ‘subject to [physical] death:’ the whole of the subsequent mercy of God in His quickening them is spiritual, and therefore of necessity the death also. That it involves physical death, is most true; but as I have often had occasion to remark [see e. g. on John xi. 25, 26], this latter is so subordinate to spiritual death, as often hardly to come into account in Scripture) by reason of (not exactly as in Col. ii. 13, “being dead in your trespasses,” where the element is more in view, whereas here it is the cause of death which is expressed.—We might render, were the expression good in serious writing, ‘dead of your trespasses,’ as we say ‘he lies dead of cholera’) [your] trespasses and sins (where the two words, trespasses and sins, occur together, the distinction seems to be, that the former indicate involuntary acts in which the limit of right is overstepped, the latter, conscious habits of doing wrong. As to the way in which this verse is to be brought into the construction of the context, the simplest view seems to be the usual one, that the Apostle began with you also, in the accusative, intending to govern it by “quickened together with Christ” (ver. 5), but was led away by the relative clauses, “wherein,” &c., “among whom,” &c., and himself takes up the dropped thread of the construction by “But God,” &c., ver. 4. At all events, the clause should be left, in translation, pendent, as it stands, and not filled in conjecturally, as in A. V.);

2.] in which (viz. sins, the last substantive, but applying in fact to both) ye once walked (we hardly need, as some, go back every time to the figure in the word walked—the word has become with the Apostle so common in its figurative sense) according to (after the leading of, conformably to) the course (so A. V.: the very best word, as so often. The original word is the age, compounded of its temporal and its ethical sense: it is not exactly ‘lifetime,’ ‘duration,’ nor again ‘fashion,’ ‘spirit,’ but some common term which will admit of being both temporally and ethically characterized,—‘career’ or ‘course’) of this world (St. Paul generally uses “the world,” but has “this world” in 1 Cor. iii. 19; v. 10; vii. 31. It designates the present system of things, as alien from God, and lying in the evil one), according to the ruler of the power (so literally: see below) of the air (the devil—the god of this world, 2 Cor. iv. 4, is clearly meant: but it is difficult exactly to dissect the phrase, and give each word its proper meaning. The power appears to be used here to represent the aggregate of those in power: as we say, ‘the government.’ St. Paul is supposed by many to have spoken in accordance with Rabbinical, or even with Pythagorean notions. But I am disposed to seek my interpretation of the words from a much more obvious source: viz. the persuasion and common parlance of mankind, founded on analogy with well-known facts. We are tempted by evil spirits, who have access to us, and suggest thoughts and desires to our minds. We are surrounded by the air, which is the vehicle of speech and of all suggestions to our senses. Tried continually as we are by these temptations, what so natural, as to assign to their ministers a dwelling in, and power over that element which is the vehicle of them to us? And thus our Lord, in the parable of the sower, when He would represent the devil coming and taking away the seed out of the heart, figures him by the birds of the air (or, of heaven). The Apostle then, in using this expression, would be appealing to the common feeling of his readers, not to any recondite or questionable system of demonology. That traces are found in such systems, of a belief agreeing with this, is merely a proof that they have embodied the same general feeling, and may be used in illustration, not as the ground, of the Apostle’s saying), of the spirit (the power being used as designating [see above] the personal aggregate of those evil ones who have this power, the spirit, in apposition with it, represents their aggregate character, as an influence on the human mind, a spirit of ungodliness and disobedience,—the “spirit of the world” of 1 Cor. ii. 12, —the aggregate of the “seducing spirits” of 1 Tim. iv. 1) which is now (i. e. ‘still’ contrast to “once,”—to you, who have escaped from his government above) working in the sons of (the expression is a Hebraism, but is strictly reproduced in the fact: that of which they are sons, is the source and spring of their lives, not merely an accidental quality belonging to them) disobedience: 3.] among whom (the “sons of disobedience:” not merely local, but “numbered among whom”) we also all (WHO? The usage of we all by St. Paul must decide. It occurs Rom. iv. 16, “who is the father of us all,” undeniably for Jews and Gentiles included: viii. 32, where the universal reference is as undeniable: 1 Cor. xii. 13, where it is still more marked: 2 Cor. iii. 18, equally undoubted. It can hardly then be that here he should have departed from his universal usage, and placed an unmeaning “all” after “we,” merely to signify, ‘we Jews, every one of us.’ I therefore infer that by we all, he means, we all, Jews and Gentiles alike; all, who are now Christians) lived our life once in (of the element, in which, see 2 Cor. i. 12; where the same double use of in, of the place, and the element, is found) the lusts of our flesh (of our unrenewed selves, under the dominion of the body and the carnal soul. See a contrast, Gal. v. 16), doing the desires (the instances in which our will manifested itself) of our flesh and of our thoughts (the plural use is remarkable. There appears to be a reference to Numb. xv. 39, in the Septuagint version, "Ye shall not turn aside after your thoughts" (the same word as here). 'Thoughts' must be understood to mean, those phases of mind which may or may not affect the will, but which then in our natural state we allowed to lead us by the desires they excited); and we were (the change of construction has been remarked by the best Commentators as intentional, not of negligence,—“to give emphasis to the weighty clause that follows, and to disconnect it from any possible relation to present time, ‘we were children of wrath by nature,—it was once our state and condition, it is now so no longer.’” Elliott) children (not sons, but implying closer relation. The effect of the expression is to set those of whom it is predicated, beneath, in subjection to, as it were, the products of, wrath) by nature (the expression amounts to an assertion on the part of the Apostle of the doctrine of original sin. There is from its secondary position no emphasis on “by nature,” but its doctrinal force as referring to a fundamental truth otherwise known, is not thereby lessened) of wrath (WHOSE wrath, is evident: the meaning being, we were all concluded under and born in sin, and so actual objects of that wrath of God which is His mind against sin), as also [are] (not, were) the rest (of mankind: i. e. all others, who are not like us, Christians).

But (contrast to the preceding verse,—

the mercy and love, to the wrath just mentioned) God, being rich (this states the general ground for what follows, and the following, “because of His great love,” the special or peculiar motive) in mercy (mercy, properly, as applying to our wretchedness before: compare Ezek. xvi. 6),—on account of His great love wherewith He loved us (the clause belongs, not to what goes before, but to the verb below. Us are all Christians; the same as “we all” in the last verse), 5.] even when we were dead in our trespasses (see on ver. 1), vivified (or, quickened: not, as A. V., “hath quickened”—a definite act in time, not an abiding consequence is spoken of) us together with Christ (Christ was THE RESURRECTION and the Life, and we follow in and because of Him. The disputes about the meaning of this vivifying, or quicken- ing, have arisen from not bearing in mind the relation in New Test. language between natural and spiritual death. We have often had occasion to observe that spiritual death in the New Test. includes in it and bears with it natural death as a consequence, to such an extent that this latter is often not thought of as worth mentioning: see especially John xi. 25, 26, which is the key-text for all passages regarding life in Christ. So here—God vivified us together with Christ: in the one act and fact of His Resurrection He raised all His people—to spiritual life, and in that to victory over death, both spiritual, and therefore necessarily physical also. To dispute therefore whether such an expression as this is past [spiritual], or future [physical], is to forget that the whole includes its parts. Our spiritual life is the primary subject of the Apostle’s thought: but this includes in itself our share in the Resurrection and exaltation [ver. 6] of Christ. The three past tenses, “quickened,” “raised up,” “made to sit,” are all anticipatory as regards the actual fact in each man, but equally describe a past and accomplished act on God's part when He raised up Christ)—by grace ye have been saved (this insertion in the midst of the mention of such great unmerited mercies to us sinners, is meant emphatically to call the reader's attention to so cogent a proof of that which the Apostle ever preached as the great foundation truth of the Gospel. Notice the perfect, 'have been saved,' not, 'are being saved,' because we have passed from death unto life: salvation is to the Christian not a future but a past thing, realized in the present by faith)—

6.] and raised us together with Him (the Resurrection of Christ being the next event consequent on His vivification in the tomb), and seated us together with Him (the Ascension being the completion of the Resurrection. So that all three verbs refer strictly to the same work wrought on Christ, and in Christ on all His mystical Body, the Church) in the heavenly places (see on ch. i. 3, 20) in Christ Jesus (as again specifying the element in which, as united and included in which, we have these blessings which have been enumerated. It is an additional qualification, and recalls the mind to the fact of our union in Him as the medium of our resurrection and glorification.—The disputes as to whether these are to be taken as present or future, actual or potential, literal or spiritual, will easily be disposed of by those who have apprehended the truth of the believer's union in and with Christ. All these we have, in fact and reality [see Phil. iii. 20], in their highest, and therefore in all lower senses, in Him: they were ours, when they were His: but for their fulness in possession we are waiting till He come, when we shall be like and with Him):

The answer must be given by comparing this with the very similar expression in Col. i. 26, 27, where it is manifest (1) that the ages from which the mystery was hidden are the past ages of this world; (2) that those to whom, as here, God will make known the riches of His glory, are His saints, i. e. His church on earth. Therefore I conceive we are compelled to interpret analogously: viz. to understand the "ages to come" of the coming ages of the church, and the persons involved in them to be the future members of the church. Thus the meaning will be nearly as in ch. i. 12.—The supposed reference to the future state of glory seems not to agree with the language here,—nor with the fact that the second coming and future kingdom of Christ are hardly ever alluded to in this Epistle) the exceeding riches of His grace in (of the material of which this display of His grace will consist, the department in which it will find its exercise) kindness (see especially Rom. ii. 4) towards us in (not 'through,' as A. V.) Christ Jesus (again and again he repeats this "in Christ Jesus:" HE is the great centre of the Epistle, towards whom all the rays of thought converge, and from whom all blessings flow; and this the Apostle will have his readers never forget). 8.]

it is the gift of God: <sup>9</sup> not of works, lest any man should boast. <sup>10</sup> For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them. <sup>11</sup> Wherefore remember, that ye being in time past Gentiles in the flesh, who are called Uncircumcision by that which is called the Circumcision in the flesh made by hands; <sup>12</sup> that at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Is-in hand—the “exceeding riches, &c.”) ye have been saved, through faith (“by grace,” above, expressed the objective instrumental condition of your salvation,—this “through faith” the subjective medial condition: it has been effected by grace and apprehended by faith); and this (‘your salvation;’ your having been saved, as Ellic.) not of yourselves: God’s (emphatic) is the gift (not, as A. V., ‘it is the gift of God;’—the gift, viz. of your salvation:—so that the expression amounts to this, ‘but it is a gift, and that gift is God’s’): not of works (see on Rom. iii. iv., and Gal. ii. 16), that no man should boast (see on Rom. iv. 2).

10.] For (substantiates vv. 8, 9). The English reader is likely to imagine a contrast between ‘not of works’ and ‘for we are His handiwork,’ which can hardly have been in the mind of the Apostle) his handiwork are we (not, in our natural creation, which idea is clearly refuted by what immediately follows,—but in the spiritual creation, treated of in vv. 8, 9), created in Christ Jesus (see ver. 15; Tit. iii. 5, where the beginning of this new life is called regeneration. See also 2 Cor. v. 17; Gal. vi. 15) for good works (just as a tree may be said to be created for its fruit: see below), which God before prepared (‘before He thus created us.’ The sentiment is the same as that in John v. 36. To recur to the similitude used above, we might say of the trees,—they were created for fruits which God before prepared that they should bear them: i. e. defined and assigned to each tree its own, in form, and flavour, and time of bearing. So in the course of God’s providence, our good works are marked out for and assigned to each one of us) that we should walk in them. Thus the truth of the maxim “good works do not go before him who is to be justified, but follow after one who is justified,” is shewn. The sentiment is strictly one of the Apostle’s,—in the spirit of Rom. xii.; Gal. v. 22, 25, &c.

That this is the sense, is evident from ver. 13: see below), alienated from (“he does not say, separated from . . . but the emphasis is strong, shewing a great severance. For there were also Israelites who were outside the commonwealth, only not as foreigners but as lax Jews, and lost their part in the covenants, not as foreigners, but as unworthy.” Chrysostom. It may be taken either 1) actively, ‘denying God,’ ‘atheist,’ 2) in a neuter sense—‘ignorant of God,’ or 3) passively, ‘forsaken of God.’ This latter meaning is best here, on account of the passive character of the other descriptive clauses) in the world (contrast to the commonwealth of Israel. “He subjoins to the godless ‘How,’ the godless ‘Where,’” Meyer): <sup>13.]</sup> but now (contrast to “at that time :” as things are

He did not make our peace and then retire, leaving us to enjoy that peace,—but is Himself its medium and its substance; His making both one was no external reconciliation, but the taking both, their common nature, on and into Himself,—see ver. 15. Bear in mind the multitude of prophetic passages which connect peace with Him, Isa. ix. 5, 6; lii. 7; liii. 5; lvii. 19; Micah v. 5; Hag. ii. 9; Zeek. ix. 10; also Luke ii. 14; John xiv. 27; xx. 19, 21, 26. And notice that already the complex idea of the whole verse, that of uniting both Jews and Gentiles in one reconciliation to God, begins to appear: for He is our Peace, not only as reconciling Jew to Gentile, not as bringing the far-off Gentile near to the Jew, but as reconciling both, united, to God; as bringing the far-off Gentile, and the near Jew, both into peace with God. For want of observing this the sense has been much obscured: see below), who made (specification, how He is our Peace. Better ‘made,’ than ‘hath made :’ the latter is true, but it is the historic fact which is here brought out) both (Jews and Gentiles. In the original both is neuter, as abstract;—both things, both elements) one, and (explanatory—‘namely, in that he’) threw down the middle wall of the fence (i.e. the middle wall which belonged to—was a necessary part of the carrying out of—the fence, or partition. The primary allusion seems to be, to the rending of the veil at the crucifixion: not that that veil separated Jew and Gentile, but that it, the chief symbol of separation from God, included in its removal the admission to Him of that one body into which Christ made Jew and Gentile. This complex idea is before the Apostle throughout the sentence: and necessarily; for the reconciliation which Christ effected between Jew and Gentile was in fact only a subordinate step of the great reconciliation of both to God, which He effected by His sacrifice in the flesh,—and in speaking of one he speaks of the other also. The partition, from what has been said above, is more general in sense than the middle wall; is in fact the whole arrangement, of which that was but an instrument—the separation itself, consequent on a system of separation: it represents therefore the whole legal system, ceremonial and moral, which made the whole separation,—of Jew from Gentile,—and in the background, of both from God), [to wit] the enmity (not, of Jew and Gentile: so strong a term is not justified as applying to their separation, nor does such a reference satisfy ver. 16,—see there;—but, the enmity in which both were involved against God, see Rom. viii. 7. the enmity is in apposition with the partition. This enmity was the real cause of separation from God, and in being so, was the inclusive, mediate cause of the separation between Jew and Gentile. Christ, by abolishing the first, abolished the other also: see below), in His flesh (to be joined, not with abolishing, as the A. V., which is very harsh, breaking the parallelism,—but with brake down. Christ destroyed the partition, i.e. the enmity, in, or by, His flesh; see on ver. 16, where the same idea is nearly repeated. It was in His crucified flesh, which was “in the likeness of the flesh of sin,” that He slew this enmity); having done away the law of decretory commandments (this law was the partition,—the great exponent of the enmity. Its specific nature was that it consisted in commandments, decretory or dogmatically expressed. This law, moral and ceremonial, its decalogue, its ordinances, its rites, was entirely done away in and by the death of Christ. See Col. ii. 13—15, notes. And the end of that abolition was); that He might create the two (Jew and Gentile) in Himself into one new man (observe, not that He might reconcile the two to each other only, nor is the Apostle speaking merely of any such reconciliation: but that he might incorporate the two, reconciled in Him to God, into one new man,—the old man to which both belonged, the enemy of God, having been slain in His flesh on the Cross. Observe, too, ONE new man: we are all in God’s sight but one in Christ, as we are but one in Adam), [so] making peace (not, between Jew and Gentile: He is the peace of us all: see below on ver. 17); and (parallel with the former purpose) might reconcile both of them (or of us) in one body (not His own human body, as Chrysostom [who however seems to waver between this and His mystical body],—but the Church, compare the same expression Col. iii. 15) unto God (if this had not been here expressed, the whole reference of the sentence would have been thought to be to the uniting Jews and Gentiles. That it is expressed, now shews that throughout, that union has been thought of only as a subordinate step in a greater reconciliation) by means of (through) the (His) cross (the cross regarded as the symbol of that which was done on and by it), having slain the enmity (this has been taken here to mean the enmity between Jew and Gentile. But see on ver. 15: and let us ask here, was this the enmity which Christ slew at His death? Was this the enmity, the slaying of which brought in the reconciliation as this verse implies? Does such a meaning of the word at all satisfy the solemnity of the sentence, or of the next two verses? I cannot think so: and must maintain the enmity here [and if here, then in ver. 15 also] to be that between man and God, which Christ did slay on the cross, and which being brought to an end, the separation between Jew and Gentile, which was the result of it, was done away) thereby (or, in or on it: viz. the cross: compare Col. ii. 15, notes: not in His body: see above): and having come, He preached (how? when? Obviously after his death, because by that death the peace was wrought. We seek in vain for any such announcement made by Him in person after his resurrection. But we find a key to the expression in John xiv. 18: see also ver. 28. And this coming was,—by his Spirit poured out on the Church. There is an expression of St. Paul's, singularly parallel with this, and of itself strongly corroborative of the genuineness of our Epistle, in Acts xxvi. 23: "That Christ should suffer, and that He should be the first that should rise from the dead, and should shew light unto the people, and to the Gentiles." This coming therefore is by His Spirit [see on ver. 18], and ministers, and ordinances in the Church) peace to you who were far off, and peace to those (not 'to us,' for fear of still upholding the distinction where he wishes to merge it altogether) that were nigh (this peace is plainly then not mere mutual reconciliation, but that far greater peace which was effected by Christ's death, peace with God, which necessitated the union of the far off and the near in one body in Him. This is shewn especially by the repetition of the word peace. See Isa. lvii. 19.—Then follows the empowering reason, why he should preach peace to us both: and it is this ver. 18 especially which cannot be satisfied on the ordinary hypothesis of mere reconciliation between Jew and Gentile being the subject in the former verses. Here clearly the union [not reconciliation, nor is enmity predicated of them] of Jew and Gentile is subordinated to the blessed fact of an access to God having been provided for both through Christ by the Spirit). 18.] For through Him we have our access (representing, both here and in Rom. v. 2, and ch. iii. 12, present liberty of approach) both of us in (united in, 1 Cor. xii. 13) one Spirit (not 'one frame of mind:' the whole structure of the sentence, as compared with any similar one, such as 2 Cor. xiii. 13, will shew what spirit is meant, viz. the Holy Spirit of God, already alluded to in ver. 17: see above. As a parallel, compare 1 Cor. xii. 13) to the Father. 19.] So then ye no longer are strangers and sojourners ('sojourners,' as dwelling among the Jews, but not numbered with them), but are fellow-citizens with the saints (comrades, co-citizens, of the saints. the saints are not angels, not Jews, nor Christians then alive merely, but the saints of God in the widest sense,—all members of the mystical body of Christ,—the commonwealth of the spiritual Israel), and of the household (i. e. 'members of God's family,' in the usual sense of the word) of God; having been built up (literally, built above: we cannot express this in one word: we have the substantive 'super-structure,' but no verb corresponding.

AUTHORIZED VERSION.

There is a transition from one image, a political and social, to another, a material upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets (how is this genitive to be understood? Is it a genitive of apposition, so that the Apostles and Prophets themselves are the foundation? This has been supposed by numerous Commentators, from Chrysostom to De Wette. But, not to mention the very many other objections which have been well and often urged against this view, this one is to my mind decisive, — that it entirely destroys the imagery of the passage. The temple, into which these Gentiles were built, is the mystical body of the Son, in which the Father dwells by the Spirit, ver. 22. The Apostles and Prophets [see below], yea, Jesus Christ Himself, as the great inclusive Head Corner Stone [see again below], are also built into this temple. [That He includes likewise the foundation, and is the foundation, is true, and must be remembered, but is not prominent here.] Clearly then the Apostles and Prophets cannot be the foundation, being here spoken of as parts of the upper building, together with these Gentiles, and with Jesus Christ Himself. But again, does the genitive mean, the foundation which the Apostles and Prophets have laid? So also very many Commentators. As clearly, — not thus. To introduce them here as agents, is as inconsistent as the other. No agents are here spoken of, but merely the fact of the great building in its several parts being built up together. The only remaining interpretation then is, to regard the genitive as simply possessive: 'the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets;' — 'the Apostles' and Prophets' foundation' — that upon which they as well as yourselves are built. This explanation, which I find ascribed to Bucer only, seems to me beyond question the right one. See more below. — But (2) who are the prophets? They have commonly been taken, without enquiry, as the Old Test. prophets. And certainly, the sense, with some little straining, would admit of this view. They may be said to be built upon Christ, as belonging to that widest acceptance of His mystical body, in which it includes all the saints, Old as well as New Test. But besides the objections arising from the form of the sentence, which the English reader cannot appreciate, there is this weighty one: the usage of the expression apostles and prophets in ch. iii. 5. There unquestionably the prophets are New Test. prophets; and again in ch. iv. 11. And it is difficult to conceive that the Apostle should have used the two words conjoined here, in a different sense. Even stronger is the consideration arising from the whole sense of the passage. All here is strictly Christian, — post-Judaic, — consequent on Christ's death, and triumph, and His coming preaching peace by the Spirit to the united family of man. So that we must decide for these prophets being New Test. prophets: those who ranked next to the Apostles in the government of the church: see Acts xi. 27, note. They were not in every case distinct from the Apostles: the apostleship probably always including the gift of prophecy: so that all the Apostles themselves might likewise have been prophets), Christ Jesus Himself (the Himself exalts the dignity of the temple, in that not only it has among its stones Apostles and prophets, but the Lord Himself is built into it) being the Head corner stone (see, besides reff., Jer. li. 26; Acts iv. 11. The reference here is clearly to that Headstone of the Corner, which is not only the most conspicuous but the most important in the building: "which, being placed in the corner, joins and rules the two walls of the building." Builders set up such a stone, or build such a pillar of brick, before getting up their walls, to rule and square them by. I must again repeat, that the fact of Jesus Christ being Himself the foundation, however it underlies the whole, is not to be brought in as interfering with this portion of the figure);

21.] in whom (Christ keeps the whole together: and not only so, but He is in reality the inclusive Head of the building: it all consists, is upheld, is squared and ruled by its unity to and in Him) all the building being framed exactly together is growing (there seems no reason why the proper sense of the present should not be retained. Both participle and verb imply that the fitting together and the growing are still going on: and the only way which we in English have to mark this so as to avoid the chance of mistake, is by the auxiliary verb substantive, and the participle. The bare present, 'groweth,' is in danger of being mistaken for the abstract quality, and the temporal development is thus lost sight of: whereas the other, in giving prominence to that temporal development, also necessarily implies the 'normal, perpetual, unconditioned nature of the organic increase') unto an holy temple in the Lord (i. e. according to apostolic usage, and the sense of the whole passage, 'in Christ.' These "in whom,"—"in the Lord," "in whom,"—like the frequent repetitions of the name Christ in vv. 12, 13, are used by the Apostle to lay all stress on the fact that Christ is the inclusive Head of all the building, the element in which it has its being and its growth. The increase spoken of will issue in its being a holy temple in Christ):

22.] in whom (viz. in the Lord —it is characteristic [see above] of this part of the epistle to string together these relative expressions, all referring to the same) ye also are being built in together (with one another, or with those before mentioned) for an habitation of God (the only true temple of God, in which He dwells, being the Body of Christ, in all the glorious acception of that term) in the Spirit (it is even now, in the state of imperfection, by the Spirit, dwelling in the hearts of believers, that God has His habitation in the Church: and then, when the growth and increase of that Church shall be completed, it will be still in and by the Holy Spirit fully penetrating and possessing the whole glorified Church, that the Father will dwell in it for ever. Thus we have the true temple of the Father, built in the Son, inhabited in the Spirit: the offices of the Three blessed Persons being distinctly pointed out: God, THE FATHER, in all His fulness, dwells in, fills the Church: that Church is constituted an holy Temple to Him in THE SON,—is inhabited by Him in the ever present indwelling of the HOLY SPIRIT. The attempt to soften away in the Spirit into "spiritually" is against the whole sense of the passage, in which not the present spiritual state of believers, but their ultimate glorious completion is spoken of).

And herein, the revelation to it of the mystery of Christ, through those ministers who wrought in the Spirit: primarily, as regarded the Ephesians, through himself. Thus first, OF HIS OFFICE AS APOSTLE OF THE GENTILES (1—13): secondly, under a form of a prayer for them, THE AIM AND END OF THAT OFFICE AS RESPECTED THE CHURCH: its becoming strong in the power of the Spirit (14—19). Then (20, 21) doxology, concluding this first division of the Epistle.

1—13.] (See above.) On this account (in order to explain this, something must be said on the construction. In my Greek Test. I have discussed the various ways of connecting this ver. 1, and of terminating the parenthesis in the sense which begins with ver. 2: and have come to the conclusion that we must consider ver. 14 as taking up the sense, with its repetition of For this cause, and the weighty prayer which it introduces, and which forms a worthy justification for so long and solemn a parenthesis. For this cause then will mean, 'seeing ye are so built in,'—stand in such a relation to God's purposes in the Church) I Paul (he mentions himself here, as introducing to them the agent in the Spirit's work who was nearest to themselves, and setting forth that work as the carrying on of his enlightenment on their behalf, and the subject of his earnest prayer for them: see argument to this chapter above), the prisoner (but now without any prominence, or the very slightest:

The matter of fact was so:—his preaching to Gentiles aroused the jealousy of the Jews, and led to his imprisonment. But he rather thinks of it as a result of his great office, and himself as a sacrifice for those whom it was his intent to benefit, if, that is (or if indeed; i.e., ‘assuming that.’ The Ephesians had heard all this, and St. Paul was now delicately reminding them of it), ye heard of (when I was among you, not “have heard,” as A. Olshausen says, “It is certainly peculiar, that Paul here calls the Apostles, and consequently himself among them, ‘holy Apostles.’ It is going too far when De Wette finds in this a sign of an unapostolic origin of the Epistle: but still the expression remains an unusual one. I account for it to myself thus,—that Paul here conceives of the Apostles and Prophets as a corporation (cf. ch. iv. 11), and as such, in their official character, he gives them the predicate holy, as he names believers, conceived as a whole, ‘holy’ or ‘sanctified,’ but never an individual”) Apostles and Prophets (as in ch. ii. 20, the New Test. Ellicott), which hath been hidden from (the beginning of) the ages (this expression gives the temporal limit from which the concealment dated: so in Rom. xvi. 25. The decree itself originated "before the foundation of the world," ch. i. 4, "before the ages," 1 Cor. ii. 7: the "ages" being the spaces or reaches of time necessary for the successive acts of created beings, either physical or spiritual) in (hidden within,—humanly speaking, 'in the bosom or the mind of') God, who created all things ("for the general creation is the foundation of all the rest of the economy of God's dealings." The stress is on all things: this concealment was nothing to be wondered at,—for God of His own will and power created ALL THINGS, a fact which involves His perfect right to adjust all things as He will. The expression is used in the widest sense, embracing physical and spiritual alike): 10.] to the intent that (general purpose of the whole: more properly to be referred perhaps to was this grace given, than to any other one word in the last two verses. For this sublime cause the humble Paul was raised up,—to bring about,—he, the least worthy of the saints,—that to the heavenly powers themselves should be made known, by means of those whom he was empowered to enlighten, &c.) there might be made known (emphatic, as opposed to "hidden," above—"no longer hidden, but . . .") now (has the secondary emphasis: opposed to "from the beginning of the ages") to the governments and to the powers (see ch. i. 21 and note) in the heavenly places (see ch. i. 3 note. The governments and the powers are those of the holy angels in heaven: not, as has been vainly imagined Jewish rulers, Christian rulers, or good and bad angels. These are excluded by the general tenor of the passage, as Ellicott remarks, who adds well: "Evil angels more naturally recognize the power, good angels the wisdom of God") by means of the Church ("when we learnt it, then they also learnt it by means of us," Chrysostom. See also Luke xv. 10; 1 Pet. i. 12. "That the holy angels are capable of a specific increase of knowledge, and of a deepening insight into God's wisdom, seems from this passage clear and incontrovertible." Ellicott. "See what honour is put upon men, in that God willed that these His secret counsels should be made known to angels by them, chiefly by the Apostles. For this cause the Angels henceforth refuse worship from Apostles, as their superiors in the ministry, Rev. xix. 10, and with reason." Grotius. But, as Stier well notices, it is not by the Apostles directly, nor by human preaching, that the Angels are instructed in God's wisdom, but by the Church;—by the fact of the great spiritual body, constituted in Christ, which they contemplate, and which is to them the theatre of the glory of God) the manifold wisdom of God (how is the wisdom of God manifold? It is all one in sublime unity of truth and purpose: but cannot be apprehended by finite minds in this its unity, and therefore is by Him variously portioned out to each finite race and finite capacity of individuals—so that the Church is a mirror of God's wisdom,—chromatic, so to speak, with the rainbow colours of that light which in itself is one and undivided. Perhaps there was in the Apostle's mind, when he chose this word, an allusion to the "wings of a dove covered with silver and her feathers with yellow gold," the adornment of the ransomed church, in Ps. lxxviii. 13. See Heb. i. 1; 1 Pet. iv. 10), 11.] according to (depends on) may be made known—this imparting of the knowledge of God's manifold wisdom was in accordance with, &c.) the purpose of (the) ages (so literally: and the genitive in the original is apparently one of time, as when we say, 'it has been an

Some would render, wrought: and apply it to the carrying out, executing, in its historical realization) in Jesus our Lord the Christ (or as in text, 'in the Christ, [even] Jesus our Lord.' The former name is official, the latter personal. It was in his Christ that He made the purpose: and that Christ is Jesus our Lord. The words bind together God's eternal purpose and our present state of access to Him by redemption in Christ, and so close the train of thought of the last eleven verses, by bringing us again home to the sense of our own blessedness in Christ): <sup>12.]</sup> in whom (for the connexion, see note on last verse: in whom, as their element and condition) we have our boldness (not 'freedom of speech' merely, nor boldness in prayer: the word is used in a far wider sense than these: viz. that of the state of mind which gives liberty of speech, cheerful boldness) and [our] access (see note on ch. ii. 18: here the intransitive sense is even more necessary, from the union with boldness. We may confidently say, that so important an objective truth as our introduction to God by Christ would never have been thus coupled to a mere subjective quality in ourselves. Both must be subjective if one is: the second less purely so than the first—but both referring to our own feelings and privileges) in confidence ("that is, coupled with a good courage," Chrysostom. Meyer remarks what a noble example St. Paul himself has given of this confidence in Rom. viii. 38 f.) through the faith ("in Christ points to the objective ground of the possession, through the faith, the subjective medium by which, and in confidence the subjective state in which, it is appre-

for it is not in virtue of God's creative power that the Apostle here prays to Him, but in virtue of His adoptive love in Christ. It is best therefore to keep the simple sense of the words, and leave it to explanation to convey the idea. Patria is the family (or in a wider sense, as the Romans named it, the gens), named so from its all having one pater. It is not easy to say, to what the reference is, or why the idea is here introduced. The Apostle seems, regarding God as the Father of us His adopted children in Christ, to go forth into the fact, that He, in this His relation to us, is in reality the great original and prototype of the paternal relation, wherever found. And this he does, by observing that every patria, compaternity, body of persons, having a common father, is thus named [in Greek], from that father,—and so every earthly [and heavenly] family reflects in its name [and constitution] the being and source of the great Father Himself. But then, what are families in heaven? Some have treated the idea of paternity there as absurd: but is it not necessarily involved in any explanation of this passage? He Himself is the Father of spirits, Heb. xii. 9, the Father of lights, James i. 17:—may there not be fathers in the heavenly Israel; as in the earthly? May not the holy Angels be bound up in spiritual families, though they marry not nor are given in marriage?], <sup>16.]</sup> that (the purpose and purport of the prayer are blended) He may give you, according to the riches of his glory (specifies the gift, not what follows: give you, in full proportion to the abundance of His own glory—His own infinite perfections), to be strengthened with might (“with might” has been taken in several ways: 1) adverbially, ‘mightily?’ 2) of the form or shape in which the strengthening was to take place: 3) the instrumental sense seems the best: ‘with [His] might,’ imparted to you) by His Spirit (as the instiller and imparter of that might) towards (not merely ‘in,’ but ‘to and into,’ as Ellicott: importing “the direction and destination of the prayed for gift of infused strength:” towards the building up of that hidden man of the heart, which is a man's self transformed into the likeness of Christ: “the inner man which contains Christ,” as a Greek writer admirably says) the inner man (the spiritual man [see above]—the noblest portion of our being, kept, in the natural man, under subjection to the flesh, but in the spiritual, renewed by the Spirit of God); that (continuation from the being strengthened,—and that as its result) Christ may dwell (emphatic; abide, take up His lasting abode: “not looked on afar by faith, but received with the embrace of our souls, that He may dwell in you.” Calvin) by your faith (apprehending Him, and opening the door to Him,—see John xiv. 23; Rev. iii. 20,—and keeping Him there) in your hearts (for there, as Calvin strikingly says, is Christ's proper place, not bandied about on the tongue, nor flitting through the brain),—ye having been rooted and grounded (both images, that of a tree, and that of a building, are supposed to have been before the Apostle's mind. But the verb to root was so constantly used in a figurative sense as hardly perhaps of necessity to suggest its primary image. The participles are what is called a pendent nominative, agreeing with you understood) in love (love generally. As Ellicott well says, “This [love] was to be their basis and foundation, on which alone they were to be fully enabled to realize all the majestic proportions of Christ's surpassing love to man”),—that ye may be fully able to compre-

See specimens in my Greek Test. It is most probable, that the question, of what, after these nouns, is left indefinite—that you may be fully able to comprehend every dimension—i.e., of all that God has revealed or done in and for us [“the mystery of God,” Col. ii. 2]—though this is not a genitive to be supplied, but lying in the background entirely), and (this and introduces not a parallel, but a subordinate clause. The knowledge here spoken of is not identical with the comprehension above, but forms one portion of it, and by its surpassing excellence serves to exalt still more that great whole to which it belongs) to know the knowledge-passing (to know that which passeth knowledge is a paradox: “knowledge” being taken in the sense of ‘mere, ‘bare’ knowledge, and “to know” in the pregnant sense of that knowledge which is rooted and grounded in love, Phil. i. 9) Love of Christ (subjective genitive,—Christ’s love to us—see Rom. v. 5 note, and viii. 35—39—not ‘our love to Christ’), that ye may be filled even to all the fulness of God (“all the fulness of the Godhead” abides in Christ, Col. ii. 9. Christ then abiding in your hearts, ye, being raised up to the comprehension of the vastness of God’s mercy in Him and of His Love, will be filled, even as God is full—each in your degree, but all to your utmost capacity, with divine wisdom and might and love).

21.] to Him (solemn and emphatic repetition of the personal pronoun) be the glory (the whole glory accruing from all His dealings which have been spoken of: His own resulting glory) in the Church (as its theatre before men, in which that glory must be recognized and rendered) and in Christ Jesus (as its inner verity, and essential element in which it abides. The two clauses are not altogether independent: it is ‘in the Church, and [thus] in Christ Jesus’) to all the generations of the age of the ages (so literally. Probably the account of the meaning is, that the age of ages [eternity] is conceived as containing ages, just as our ‘age’ contains years: and then those ages are thought of as made up, like ours, of generations. Like the similar expression, ages of ages, it is used, by a transfer of what we know in time, to express, imperfectly, and indeed improperly, the idea of Eternity).

[A] (IV. 1—16) ground of the Christian's duties as a member of the Church, viz. the unity of the mystical Body of Christ (vv. 1—6) in the manifoldness of grace given to each (7—13), that we may come to perfection in Him (14—16).

1.] I beseech you therefore (seeing that this is your calling: an inference from all the former part of the Epistle, as in Rom. xii. 1; but here perhaps also a resumption of "For this cause" of ch. iii. 1, 14, and we are thus carried back to the contents of ch. i. ii.), I the prisoner in the Lord (who am, as regards, and for the sake of the cause of, the Lord, a prisoner; so that my captivity is in the Lord, as its element and sphere, and therefore to be regarded as an additional inducement to comply with my exhortation. "For whatever is Christ's, even though disgraceful in the eyes of the world, ought to be regarded by you with the utmost respect." Calvin. Theodoret remarks, that he is prouder of his chains in Christ, than a monarch of his diadem), to walk worthily of the calling (see ch. i. 18, and note Rom. viii. 28, 30) wherewith ye were called.

2.] with all (see on ch. i. 8) lowliness and meekness (before God, accepting His dealings in humility, and before men, as God's instruments, 2 Sam. xvi. 11: resting therefore on lowliness as its foundation), with longsuffering (longsuffering consists in not taking swift vengeance, but leaving to an offender a place for repentance. From this, its proper meaning, it is easily further generalized to forbearance under all circumstances of provocation), forbearing (see Rom. ii. 4) one another in love; 3.] earnestly striving to maintain the unity of the Spirit (that unity, in which God's Holy Spirit in the Church unites men differing in race and habits, as Chrysostom.—The genitive is in fact a possessive—the Spirit's unity, that unity which the Spirit brings about) in (united together by: within) the bond of peace (the bond is peace, not that which brings about peace, namely, love, as Bengel says. Col. iii. 14, which is quoted to support this meaning, is not applicable, because love there is expressly named, whereas here it certainly would not occur to any reader, especially after in love has just occurred. The genitive of apposition is the simplest—peace binds together the Church as a condition and symbol of that inner unity which is only wrought by the indwelling Spirit of God).

4.] (There is) (these words are not expressed in the original: but it is better to supply thus, than 'ye are,' which will not apply to the following parallel clauses. The assertion of the unity of the Church, and of our Lord in all His operations and ordinances, springs immediately out of the last exhortation, as following it up to its great primal ground in the verities of God) one Body ("what is this one body? the faithful all over the world, past, present, and to come." Chrysostom), and one Spirit (viz. the Holy Spirit, who dwells in, and vivifies, and rules that one body: see ch. ii. 18, 22; 1 Cor. xii. 13 al.), as also ye were called in (elemental—the condition and sphere in which they were called to live and move) one hope of (belonging to: you were called in it as the element, see above: it is then an accident of the calling. Or perhaps it may be the genitive of the efficient cause, 'which the calling works') your calling; 5.] one Lord (as the Head of the Church: in this verse he grounds the co-existence of the "one body and one Spirit" in the three great facts on which it rests—the first objective,—one Lord—the second subjective,—one faith—the third compounded of the two,—one baptism), one faith (in that one Lord: the subjective medium by which that one Lord is apprehended and appropriated: not faith which we believed, but, faith by which we believe: but it is necessarily understood, that this subjective faith has for its object the One Lord just mentioned), one baptism (the objective seal of the subjective faith, by which, as a badge, the members of Christ are outwardly and visibly stamped with His name. The other sacrament, being a matured act of subsequent participation, a function of the incorporate, not a seal of incorporation [a symbol of union, not of unity: so Ellicott], is not here adduced. In 1 Cor. x. 17, where an act was in question which was a clear breach of union, it forms the rallying-point).

6.] one God (the unity is here consummated in its central Object: "this is the chief thing, because from this all the rest flow." Calvin. But we must not miss the distinct witness to the doctrine of the Holy Trinity in these verses:—going upwards, we have 1st, the One Spirit dwelling in the one body:—2nd, the One Lord appropriated by faith and professed in baptism:—3rd, One God and Father supreme, in whom all find their end and object) and Father of all (masculine,—all men; 'of all within the Church,' for so is clearly the primary meaning, where he is speaking distinctly of the Church:—of all who have the adoption. But it can hardly be doubted, that there is a further reference—to the universal Fatherhood of all men—which indeed the Church only inherits in its fulness, others having fallen out of it by sin,—but which nevertheless is just as absolutely true), who is over all (men, primarily; and from the following,—men only, in this place. He is over all, in his sovereignty as the FATHER), and through all (men, in the co-extensiveness of Redemption by the Son with the whole nature of man: see on ver. 10 below, and ch. ii. 20, 21), and in all (men: by the indwelling of the Spirit, see ch. ii. 22. So that I cannot but recognize, in these three carefully chosen expressions, a distinct allusion again to the Three Persons of the blessed Trinity. All these are the work of the Father:—it is He who in direct sovereignty is over all—He who is glorified in the filling of all things by the Son:—He who is revealed by the witness of the indwelling Spirit).

7.] But (the contrast is between in all and to each one—the general, and the particular. And the connexion is—as a motive to keep the unity of the Spirit—'none is overlooked:—each has his part in the distribution of the gifts of the One Spirit, which part he is bound to use for the well-being of the whole') to each one of us was given (by Christ, at the time of His exaltation—when He bestowed gifts on men) [the] grace (which was then bestowed: the unspeakable gift,—or grace, absolutely,—was distributed to each, &c.) according to the measure of (subjective genitive: the amount of: compare Rom. xii. 3) the gift of Christ ('Christ's gift;'—the gift bestowed by Christ, 2 Cor. ix. 15: not, 'the gift which Christ received,'—for He is the subject and centre here—so Calvin, "He makes Christ the Author of the gift, because, as he made a beginning from the Father, so he desires to sum up us and all that is ours in Him").

8.] Wherefore (i.e., since the gift was bestowed by Christ on different men according to measure) He (viz. God, whose word the Scriptures are) saith (viz. in Ps. lxxviii. 18, see below. With the question as to the occasion and intent of that Psalm, we are not here concerned. It is a song of triumph, as ver. 1 [compare Numb. x. 35] shews, at some bringing up of the ark to the hill of Zion. It is therefore a Messianic Psalm. Every part of that ark, every stone of that hill, was full of spiritual meaning. Every note struck on the lyres of the sweet singers of Israel, is but part of a chord, deep and world-wide, sounding from the golden harps of redemption. The partial triumphs of David and Solomon only prefigured as in a prophetic mirror the universal and eternal triumph of the Incarnate Son of God. Those who do not understand this, have yet their first lesson in the Old Test. to learn. With this caution, let us approach the difficulties of the citation in detail, When he ascended up on high (viz. Christ, at His Ascension. The ascending, in the Psalm, is that of God, whose presence was symbolized by the ark, to Zion. The Apostle changes the words from the 2nd person to the 3rd; the address asserting a fact, which fact he cites), he led captive a captivity (i.e. 'those who suffer captivity': a troop of captives: such is the constant usage of the abstract word captivity for the concrete in the Septuagint: and it is never put for 'those who cause captivity,' as some would interpret it. In the Psalm, these would be, the captives from the then war, whatever it was: in the interpretation, they were God's enemies, Satan and his hosts), he gave gifts unto mankind (the original meaning of the Hebrew is obscure. The sense (see my Greek Test.) seems to be, 'Thou hast taken gifts among men,' hast, as a victor, surrounded by thy victorious host, brought gifts home, spoils of the enemy:—and the result of such reception of gifts would be naturally stated as the distribution of them among such hosts, and the people,—as indeed ver. 12 of the Psalm has already stated. And so the Chaldee paraphrast understood the words, interpreting the passage of Moses: 'thou hast given gifts to the sons of men'). <sup>9.</sup> Further explanation of this text. But that He ascended, what is it (does it imply) except that He also (as well) descended into the lower parts of the earth (the argument seems to be this: the Ascension here spoken of was not a first exaltation, but a return to heaven of one who dwelt in heaven: compare John iii. 13, which is in fact the key to these verses. The ascent implied a previous descent. This is the leading thought. But it is he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men. <sup>9</sup> (Now that he ascended, what is it but that he also descended first into the lower parts of the earth? <sup>10</sup> He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that he might doubted how far the words the lower parts of the earth carry that descent, whether to earth merely, so that "of the earth" is the genitive of apposition, "the lower parts, which are the earth,"—or to Hades, so that it is genitive of possession, "the lower parts which belong to the earth." It cannot be said that the descent into hell would be irrelevant here,—or that our Lord ascended, not from Hades, but from the earth: for, the fact of descent being the primary thought, we have only to ask as above, how far that descent is carried in the Apostle's mind. The greater the descent, the greater the ascent: and if the captivity consisted of Satan and his powers, the warfare in which they were taken captive would most naturally be contemplated in all its extent, as reaching to their habitation itself:—'this ascent, what does it imply but a descent, and that even to the lower parts of the earth from which the spoils of victory were fetched?' And this meaning seems to be upheld by the words, "that he might fill all things," which follow, as well as by the contrast furnished by up above all the heavens.—This interpretation is upheld by most of the ancients, and some of the best of the moderns: that of the Incarnation merely, descent on earth, by most of the moderns: that of Christ's death [and burial], by Chrysostom and some others)?

<sup>10.]</sup> He that descended, He (and no other: "for it was not one that descended, and another that ascended," Theodoret) is also He that ascended (in English idiom, we must express it as in the text; see again John iii. 13) up above (see on ch. i. 21) all the heavens (compare Heb. vii. 26, "made higher than the heavens:" and iv. 14, "that has passed through the heavens." It is natural that one who, like St. Paul, had been brought up in the Jewish habits of thought, should still use their methods of speaking, according to which the heaven is expressed in the

See note on Acts xxi. 8); some as pastors and teachers (from these latter not being distinguished from the pastors by the repetition of "some as," it would seem that the two offices were held by the same persons. The figure in pastors, if to be pressed, would imply that they were entrusted with some special flock, which they tended, "residing in and busied about some one spot," as Chrysostom says; and then the "teaching" would necessarily form a chief part of their work. If this view be correct, this last class includes all the stationary officers of particular Churches); <sup>12.</sup>] in order to (ultimate aim of these offices, see below) the perfecting of the saints, for (immediate object, see below) (the) work of (the) ministry (of ministry in God's Church. No doubt they have, as regards its substance, but not as regards clearness and purity; because the object of faith may be diversely known, and knowledge has always such a powerful influence on faith. Therefore he adds to this unity of faith, and of the perfect knowledge, &c.: true and full unity of faith is then found, when all thoroughly know Christ, the object of faith, alike, and that in His highest dignity as the Son of God." De Wette) and of the perfect knowledge (further result of the faith, ch. iii. 17, 19; 2 Pet. i. 5) of the Son of God (this objective genitive belongs to both substantives, "the faith" and "the perfect knowledge"), at the full-grown man (an awkwardness is given by the coupling of an abstract [unto the unity] to a concrete [unto a full-grown man]). The singular not only denotes unity, but refers to the summation of us all in the one perfect Man Christ Jesus. the Greek word may mean either. The similitude in the words "full-grown man" seems to be derived from age: that in ver. 16, from stature. The balance here is inclined in favour of stature, by the prevalence of the image of growth and extension, which can hardly be denied as pervading the passage) of the fulness of Christ (see note on ch. i. 23; iii. 19. Of Christ is a genitive subjective:—the fulness which Christ has: 'Christ's fulness.' Compare Gal. iv. 19): that (apparently another, and subordinate, aim of the bestowal of gifts on the church is here adduced. For we cannot go forward from the finished growth of ver. 13, and say that its object is that we be no longer children, but must go back again to the growth itself and its purpose; that purpose being mainly the terminal one of ver. 13, and subordinately the intermediate one of our ver. 14) we be no more (having been so once) children tossed (like waves: see James i. 6) and borne about by every wind of teaching (the Commentators quote from Plutarch, that "a man is not to let himself be carried obliquely by every argument as by a wind"), in (elemental: "the evil atmosphere, as it were, in which the varying currents of doctrine exist and exert their force." The verb has the widest meaning of being true—and [as Stier remarks] not without a certain sense of effort, 'following after the truth.' The Vulgate gives it well, but perhaps with too exclusively practical a bearing, "doing truth:" the Five Clergymen, 'holding the truth,' which is objectionable as resolving the sense into mere orthodoxy: the old English versions, 'folowe the truth,' which by "the truth," still gives too much the objective sense. It is almost impossible to express it satisfactorily in English. I have somewhat modified this last rendering, restoring the general sense of 'truth.' The objection to 'followers of truth' is that it may be mistaken for 'searchers after truth'—but I can find no expression which does not lie open to equal objection) in love (this is added, as the element in which the Christian following of truth must take place: it is not and cannot be a following of truth at all hazards: but must be conditioned by love: a true-seeking and true-being with loving caution and kind allowance—not breaking up, but cementing, brotherly love by walking in truth) may grow up into (increase towards the measure of the stature of;—to the perfect man in Him. Thus 'the life of God' will mean, as Beza beautifully says, "that life which God liveth in His own;" for, as Bengel says, "the spiritual life is kindled in believers from God's own life." Stier makes an important remark: "The Apostle is here treating, not so much of the life of God in Christ which is regenerated in believers, as of the original state of man, when God was his Life and Light, before the irruption of darkness into human nature") on account of the ignorance (of God: see 1 Pet. i. 14) that is in them (not, by nature: compare Rom. i. 21—28: they did not choose to retain God in their knowledge, and this loss of the knowledge of Him alienated them from the divine Life), on account of (second clause, subordinate to alienated, &c.) the hardening (not blindness, as A. V., which is a mistaken rendering of the word. The proper meaning is becoming callous, as a part of the body does where the skin is hardened by constant friction or pressure. "By 'hardening' he means the last degree of insensibility: for the callosities in the body have no feeling, being altogether deadened." Theodoret) of their heart, 19.] who as being past feeling gave up themselves ("themselves, with terrific emphasis. It accorded here with the hortatory object of the Apostle to bring into prominence that which happened on the side of their own free will. It is otherwise in Rom. i. 24, 'God gave them up:' and the two treatments of the fact are not inconsistent, but parallel, each having its vindication and its full truth in the matter of fact of the context." It is self-seeking, or greed: in whatever direction this central evil tendency finds its employment. first hearing of the voice of the Son of God, and growing in the knowledge of Him when awakened from spiritual death), according as is truth in Jesus (the rendering and connexion of this clause have been much disputed. I will remark, 1) that it seems by its form to be subordinate to "in Him that ye were taught," and the according as to express the quality of the teaching: 2) that in this case we have truth is in Jesus answering to "in Him that ye were taught." 3) To take the easier members first, in Jesus is a closer personal specification of in Him—in Jesus—that one name recalling their union in both in His Person, and, which is important here, in His example also: 4) as is truth expands ye were taught—if the nature of the teaching which you received was according to that which is truth [in Him]. So that the meaning will amount to this—if ye were taught in Him according to that which is truth in Jesus;—if you received into yourselves, when you listened to the teaching of the Gospel, that which is true [respecting you—and Him] in your union with and life in Jesus, the Son of God manifest in the flesh),

It is a Spirit, in some sense belonging to, not merely dwelling in, you. The fact is, that in the New Test. the "spirit" of man is only then used in its proper sense, as worthy of its place and governing functions, when it is one Spirit with the Lord. We read of no "old spirit:" the spiritual man is necessarily a man dwelt in by the Spirit of God: the psychic man is the 'animal' man led by the psyché (the animal soul), and not having a spirit, Jude 19. Thus then the disciples of Christ are being renewed, undergoing a process of renewal in the life of God, by the agency of the spirit of their minds, the restored and divinely-informed leading principle of their mind, just as the children of the world are walking in the vanity of their minds); 24.] and put on the new man (as opposed to the old, not meaning Christ, any further than as He is its great Head and prototype; see below), which was created (as historical fact, once for all, in Christ. The doctrine of the restoration to us of the divine image in Christ, as here implied, is not to be overlooked. Not the bare fact of Gen. i. 27, but the great truth which that fact represents, is alluded to. or sphere, of the character of the new man) righteousness and holiness of the truth (again, beware of 'true holiness,' A. V.—as destroying the whole antithesis and force of the words. The genitive, too, belongs to both substantives. the truth, God's essence, John iii. 33; Rom. i. 25; iii. 7; xv. 8, opposed to "deceit." "Righteousness and holiness occur together, but in contrary order, in Luke i. 75, and Wisd. ix. 3. The adjectives and adverbs are connected, 1 Thess. ii. 10; Tit. i. 8. Righteousness betokens a just relation among the powers of the soul within, and towards men and duties without. But holiness betokens the integrity of the spiritual life, and the piety towards God of which that is the condition. Hence both expressions together complete the idea of moral perfection [Matt. v. 48]. As here the ethical side of the divine image is brought out, Col. iii. 10 brings out the intellectual. The new birth alone leads to perfect knowledge: all knowledge which proceeds not from renewal of heart is but outward appearance: and of this kind was that among the false Colossian teachers." Olshausen).

25.] Wherefore (because of the general character of the new man as contrasted with the old, which has been given: "before, he spoke generally of the old man: now he describes it part by part." Chrysostom) having put away (the past tense should be noticed here: it was open to the Apostle to write "putting away," but he prefers the past—because the man must have once for all put off falsehood as a characteristic before he enters the habit of speaking truth) falsehood (abstract), speak truth each one with his neighbour (a quotation from the prophet Zechariah, see ref.): for we are members of one another (Rom. xii. 5. of one another brings out the relation between man and man more strongly than if he had said, of one body: at the same time it serves to remind them that all mutual duties of Christians are grounded on their union to and in Christ, and not on mere ethical considerations). 26.] Be ye angry, and sin not (citation: see ref.: and from the Septuagint version, not from the Hebrew, which [see Hupfeld on the Psalms in loc.] means 'tremble' ['stand in awe,' A. V.] and sin not.' The first imperative, although by way of command, is so in a weaker degree than the other: it is rather assumptive, than permissive.—'Be angry [if it must be so].' It has been asked (by Tholuck, Sermon on the Mount):—"If Paul speaks of culpable anger, how can he distinguish sinning from being angry? If of allowable anger, how can he expect not to retain it over the night?"—but we may answer that he speaks of anger which is an infirmity, but by being cherished, may become a sin): let the sun not set upon your irritation (i. e. set to your wrath with a brother a speedy limit, and indeed that one which nature prescribes—the solemn season when you part from that brother, to meet again perhaps in eternity): 27.] nor again (there is a slight climax: see below) give scope (opportunity of action, which you would do by continuing in a state of irritation) to the devil (not, to the slanderer, as some attempt to make it mean: the word "diabolos" as a substantive always has this personal meaning in the New Test.). 28.] Let him that stealeth (not 'that stole,' as A. V. Stier remarks well, that the word lies between "him that stole" and "the thief:" the former would be too mild, the latter too strong) steal no longer: but rather ("for it is not enough to leave off his sin, but he must enter on a course of life opposite to it." Theophylact) let him labour, working (see John vi. 27 and note) with his hands (contrast to his former idleness for good, and bad use of those hands) that which is good (contrast to his former evil gain by theft), in order that (as a purpose to be set before every Christian in his honest labour) he may have to impart to him that hath need. <sup>29.</sup> Let every corrupt (or, worthless; "that has no profitable work to do," Chrysostom: not so much 'filthy,'—see ch. v. 4) saying not come forth (so the original, according to the Greek idiom) from your mouth, but whatever (saying) is good for building up of the (present) need (the need is the deficiency; the part which needs to be built up, the defect to be supplied by edification), that it may give grace (minister spiritual benefit: be a means of conveying through you the grace of God) to them that hear.

<sup>30.]</sup> And (Theophylact finely gives the connexion: "If thou speak a word corrupt and unbecoming a Christian mouth, thou hast grieved, not man, but the Spirit of God") grieve not (the expression is according to man's ideas,—but truly and touchingly sets forth the love of God, which [Rom. v. 5] is shed abroad in our hearts by His Spirit) the Holy Spirit of God, in whom (as the element, condition, of the sealing: not, as A. V., "whereby;" the sealing, both of the Lord and of us His members, is the act of the Father, John vi. 27: the Spirit being the seal, ch. i. 13) ye were sealed unto (in reservation for) the day of redemption (the day when redemption shall be complete in glory—see again ch. i. 13. So far from the doctrine of final perseverance, for which Eadie here more sharply than reasonably contends, being involved here, there could hardly be a plainer denial of it by implication. For in what would issue the grieving of the Holy Spirit, if not in quenching His testimony, and causing Him to depart from them? The caution of Theophylact, "break not the seal," is a direct inference from the passage).

<sup>31.]</sup> Let all bitterness (not only of speech, but of disposition), and wrath, and anger ("wrath is a temporary, anger a chronic bearing of malice," Ammonius. Both are effects of bitterness, considered as a rooted disposition), and clamour ("in which angry men break forth," Estius), and evil speaking (the more chronic form of clamour—the reviling another not by an outbreak of abuse, but by the insidious undermining of evil surmise and slander. Chrysostom traces a progress in the vices mentioned: "See how he pushes forward the description of evil. Bitterness begets wrath, wrath begets anger, anger begets clamour, clamour begets slander"), be put away from you, with all malice (the inner root, out of which all these spring. "We know, that those enmities are most savage which are cherished within and make no show to those who are without." Chrysostom): <sup>32.]</sup> but be ye (literally, become ye: but it is very difficult to mark the distinction between become and be in a translation. Become ye is certainly too far off the time present; be ye, too immediately belonging to it. The difficulty is best seen in such a command as that in John xx. 27, "Be not (become not) faithless, but believing") towards one another, kind (see note, Gal. v. 22), tenderhearted, forgiving (see Luke vii. 42. that the three, kind, tenderhearted, forgiving, are opposed respectively to bitterness, wrath, and anger each other, even as (argument from His example whom we ought to resemble—also from the mingled motives of justice and gratitude, as Matt. xviii. 33) God in Christ (not ‘for Christ’s sake,’ as A. V., see 2 Cor. v. 19, 20. God IN Christ, manifested in Him, in all He has done, and suffered: Christ is the sphere, the conditional element in which this act took place) forgave you (not ‘has forgiven,’ as A. V. It is the historical fact of Christ once for all putting away sin by the sacrifice of Himself, which is alluded to. So that we are not to attempt to change the meaning into a future, as is often done, especially in prayers: e.g. “even, as thou, Lord, for Christ’s sake, hast promised to forgive us.” Family Prayers by the late Bishop Blomfield, p. 43).

V. 1, 2.] These verses are best taken as transitional,—the inference from the exhortation which has immediately preceded, and introduction to the dehortatory passage which follows. Certainly Stier seems right in viewing the walk in love as resuming ch. iv. 1, and indicating a beginning, rather than a close, of a paragraph.—Be ye (or, ‘become ye,’ see on last verse) therefore (seeing that God forgave you in Christ, see next verse) imitators of God (viz. in walking in love, see below), as children beloved (see next verse; and 1 John iv. 19); and (shew it by this, that ye) walk in love, as Christ also (this comes even nearer: from the love of the Father who gave His Son, to that of the Son, the Personal manifestation of that love in, our humanity) loved (not, ‘hath loved,’ as A. V.) us (the appeal, with the reading us, is a general one, deduced from the universal relation of us all to Christ: with you, it is more a personal one to the Ephesians), and gave up Him- self (absolute; not to be joined with “to God”) for us (see note on Gal. iii. 13:—“on our behalf?” in fact, but not necessarily here implied, “in our stead”) an offering and a sacrifice (I believe the nearest approach to the truth in the question of the difference between offering and sacrifice will be made by regarding offering as the more general word, including all kinds of offering,—sacrifice as the more special one, usually involving the death of a victim. The great prominent idea here is the one sacrifice, which the Son of God made of Himself in his redeeming Love, in our nature—bringing it, in Himself, near to God—offering Himself as our representative Head: whether in perfect righteousness of life, or in sacrifice, properly so called, at his Death) to God (to be joined with the substantives “offering” and “sacrifice,” not with the verb, gave Himself up) for an odour of sweet smell (the question so much discussed, whether these words can apply to a sin-offering strictly so called, is an irrelevant one here. It is not [see above] the death of Christ which is treated of, but the whole process of His redeeming love. His death lies in the background, as one, and the chief, of the acknowledged facts of that process: but it does not give the character to what is here predicated of Him. The allusion primarily is to Gen. viii. 21, where after Noah had brought to God a sacrifice of every clean beast and bird, “the Lord smelled a sweet savour,”—and the promise followed, that He would no more destroy the earth for man’s sake).

3—21.] Dehortation (for the most part) from works unbecoming the holiness of the life of children and imitators of God.

4.] and obscenity (not in word only, and foolish talking (Trench well maintains, that in Christian ethics, this means more than mere 'random talk': it is that talk of fools, which is folly and sin together), or (disjunctive, marking off jesting, as covetousness before) jesting (much interest attaches to this word. It had at first a good signification: "the habit of one easy and genial," but got a bad sense, the being time-serving, easily turned,—or given to levity and inconsistency in talk; then finally settled down to the sense of jesting, ordinarily in a profligate sense), which are not becoming; but rather thanksgiving (how are we to fill up this clause? Probably, "but rather thanksgiving is becoming:" or, "but rather let thanksgiving be named among you." The former seems the more probable. The connexion is apparently, 'your true cheerfulness and play of fancy will be found, not in buffoonery, but in the joy of a heart overflowing with a sense of God's mercies').

This reading necessarily confines the reference to that one word) an idolater (compare Col. iii. 5, and Job xxxi. 24—28;

Ps. lii. 7; Matt. vi. 24. Meyer remarks well, that it was very natural for St. Paul, whose forsaking of all things [2 Cor. vi. 10; xi. 27] so strongly contrasted with selfish greediness, to mark with the deepest reprobation the sin of covetousness), hath not inheritance (the present implying more the fixedness of the exclusion, grounded on the eternal verities of that Kingdom,—than mere future certainty: see 1 Cor. xv. 25) in the kingdom of Christ and God (not 'and of God,' as A. The caution was especially needed, at a time when moral purity was so generally regarded as a thing indifferent. Harless quotes from Bullinger,—“There were at Ephesus corrupt men, as there are in abundance among us now, who receive these salutary precepts of God with loud laughter, calling sins of uncleanness mere human weakness: acts of extortion, prudence: idle jesting, pleasantry,—and inferring that God will not be very severe on lapses of this kind”): for (let them say what they will, it is a fact, that) on account of these things (the above-mentioned crimes, see Col. iii. 6) cometh (present, as "hath," ver. 5) the wrath of God (not merely, nor chiefly, His

The word [which in the original may mean either] is a valuable middle term between unbelief and disobedience, implying their identity in a manner full of the highest instruction).

7 Be not ye therefore partakers with them. 8 For ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord: walk as children of light: 9 (for the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness and righteousness and truth;) 10 proving what is acceptable unto the Lord. 11 And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them. 12 For it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret. 13 But ditioning element) the Lord (Jesus): walk (the omission of "therefore" makes the inference rhetorically more forcible) as children of light; 9.] for (gives the reason of the introduction of the comparison in the context, connecting this with the moral details which have preceded) the fruit of the light is in (is borne within the sphere of, as its condition and element) all goodness and righteousness and truth (in all that is good [Gal. v. 22], right, and true); 10.] proving (to be joined with the verb walk, ver. 9 having been parenthetical. The Christian's whole course is a continual proving, testing, of the will of God in practice: investigating not what pleases himself, but what pleases Him) what is well pleasing unto the Lord. 11.] And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness (see Gal. v. 19, 22; on which Jerome says, "Vices finish with themselves and perish; virtues put forth fruit and abound." See also the distinction in John iii. 20, 21; v. 29), but rather even reprove them (in words: not only abstain from fellowship with them, but attack them and put them to shame). 12.] For (the connexion seems to be, 'reprove them—this they want, and this is more befitting you—for to have the least part in them, even in speaking of them, is shameful') the things done in secret by them it is shameful even to speak of (the connexion being—'I mention not, and you need not speak of, these deeds of darkness, much less have any fellowship with them—your connexion with them must be only that which the act of reproof necessitates').

in secret) all things (not only, all the things done in secret, as Ellicott after Jerome, al.: the Apostle is treating of the general detecting power of light, as is evident by the resumption of the all in the next clause) being reprov'd are made manifest by the light: for every thing that is made manifest is light (the meaning being, 'the light of your Christian life, which will be by your reproof shed upon these deeds of darkness, will bring them out of the category of darkness into light' ["when it is manifested it becomes light," Chrysostom]. They themselves were thus 'once darkness,' but having been 'reprov'd' by God's Spirit, had become 'light in the Lord.' The A. V. is doubly wrong—1) in 'all things that are reprov'd.' 2) in 'whatsoever doth make manifest is light' [which is also an ungrammatical reading of the Greek]: besides that such a proposition has absolutely no meaning in the context). <sup>14.</sup> Wherefore

(this being so—seeing that every thing that is made manifest becomes light,—is shone upon by the detecting light of Christ,—objectively,—it only remains that the man should be shone upon inwardly by the same Christ revealed in his awakened heart. We have then in Scripture an exhortation to that effect) He (viz. God, in the Scripture: see ch. iv. 8 note. No other reading is allowable) saith, Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall shine upon thee (where is this citation to be found? In the first place, by the introduction of the word Christ it is manifestly a paraphrase, not an exact citation. The Apostle cites, and had a perfect right to cite, the language of prophecy in the light of the fulfilment of prophecy: and that he is here doing so, the bare word 'Christ' shews us beyond dispute. I insist on this, that it may be plainly shewn to be no shift in a difficulty, no hypothesis among hypotheses,—but the necessary inference from the form of the citation. This being so,—of what passage of the Old Test. is this a paraphrase? I answer, of Isa. lx. 1, 2. There, the Church is set forth as being in a state of darkness and of death [cf. lx. 10], and is exhorted to awake, and become light, for that her light is come, and the glory of Jehovah has arisen upon her). <sup>15.</sup>

He now resumes the hortative strain, interrupted by the digression of vv. 12—14. Take heed then (there is not any immediate connexion with the last verse: but the then resumes from the "walk" in ver. 8, and that which followed it there) how ye walk strictly (the construction is exactly as in 1 Cor. iii. 10, "Let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon." "Take heed of what sort your strict walking is:"—the implication being, 'take heed not only that your walk be exact, strict, but also of what sort that strictness is—not only that you have a rule, and keep to it, but that that rule be the best one.' So that a double exhortation is involved, (namely) not as unwise, but as wise (qualification of the walking strictly, and expansion of the manner of such walking). <sup>16.</sup> buying up (for yourselves) (the) opportunity (viz. of good, whenever occurring [best rendered in an English version by a plural, opportunities]; let it not pass by, but as merchants carefully looking out for vantages, make it your own: see Col. iv. 5), because the days (of your time,—in which you live) are evil.

<sup>17.</sup> On this account (because ye have need so prudently to define your rule of life, and so carefully to watch for opportunities of good) be not (better than 'do not become,' which puts the 18.] The connexion seems to be: after the general antithesis in ver. 17, "be not foolish, but understand," &c., he proceeds to give one prominent instance, in the same antithetical shape. And (introducing a particular case after a general injunction) be not drunken with wine, in which [practice] (not, in wine, but the being drunken with it—the crime is not in God's gift, but in the abuse of it: and the very arrangement of the sentence in the Greek, besides the spirit of it, implies the lawful use of wine—see 1 Tim. v. 23) is profligacy (the word in the Greek is derived from not saving, squandering: and, as spend-thrifts are almost of necessity self-indulgent and reckless, the word comes to have the meaning of 'dissoluteness,' 'debauchery,' 'profligacy'); but (contrast, see above) be filled (antithesis to being drunken with wine) with (literally, 'in': let this be the region in, and the ingredient with which you are filled) the Spirit (your own spirit, dwelt in and informed by the Holy Spirit of God, see note on ch. iv. 23. If this is so, if you are full of the Spirit, full in Spirit, there will be a joy indeed, but not that of profligacy: one which will find its expression not in drunken songs, but in Christian hymns, and continual thankfulness); 19.] speaking to one another (ch. iv. 32; see also the parallel place, Col. iii. 16. It is perhaps too much to find in this the practice of antiphonal chanting: but it is interesting to remember that in Pliny's letter the Christians are described as accustomed to meet on a set day before day, and to sing a song to Christ as God by turns among themselves: Nicephorus, Hist. xiii. 8, says, "The custom of antiphonal chanting the church has received from as far back as the Apostles") in psalms (not to be confined, as Olshausen and Stier, to Old Test. hymns; see 1 Cor. xiv. 26; James v. 13. The word properly signified those sacred songs which were performed with musical accompaniment,—as hymns without it: but the two must evidently here not be confined strictly to their proper meaning) and hymns (see above) and [spiritual] songs (or, odes: the general name for all lyrical poetry, and applying especially to such effusions as persons used in the state of drunkenness; the Christian's ode is to be spiritual, inspired by that fulness of the Spirit which is in him), singing and playing (as well as speaking, not explanatory of it: singing and playing corresponding to hymns and psalms above) in your heart to the Lord (i.e. Christ—compare Pliny's letter above); 20.] giving thanks (another additional, not explanatory, clause) always for all things (see Phil. iv. 6: not only for blessings, but for every dispensation of God) in the name (the element in which the giving thanks must take place. "The name of the Lord is there, where He is named. How He is named, depends on the particular circumstances: it is one thing to be reproached [1 Pet. iv. 14], another to be saved [Acts iv. 12], another to be baptized [Acts x. 48], another to command [2 Thess. iii. 6], another to pray [John xiv. 13], another to give thanks [compare Col. iii. 17] in the name of the Lord. . . . Father (see on ch. i. 3); 21.] submitting yourselves to one another (a fourth additional, not subordinate clause: speaking,—singing and playing,—giving thanks,—submitting yourselves: and then out of this last general injunction are unfolded all the particular applications to the relations of life, ver. 22—ch. vi. 9. It is not so easy to assign precisely its connexion with those which have preceded. I would regard it as a thought suggested by the “Be not drunken,” &c., with which the sentence began—that as we are otherwise to be filled, otherwise to sing and rejoice, so also we are otherwise to behave—not blustering nor letting our voices rise in selfish vaunting, as such men do,—but subject to one another, &c.) in the fear of Christ (this is an uncommon phrase: of Him, whose members we all are, so that any displacement in the Body is a forgetfulness of the reverence due to Him).

22—VL 9.] The Church, in her relation to Christ, comprehending and hallowing those earthly relations on which all social unity (and hers also) is founded, the Apostle proceeds to treat of the three greatest of those: that of husband and wife (vv. 22—33), that of parent and child (ch. vi. 1—4), that of master and servant (vi. 5—9).

22—33.] Mutual duties of wives and husbands, arising from the relation between Christ and the Church.

22.] Wives (supply, as has been inserted, “be subject,” seeing that the subsequent address to husbands is in the 2nd person), unto your own husbands (own, as we often use the word [e.g. ‘He murdered his own father’], to intensify the recognition of the relationship, and to suggest its duties: see 1 Cor. vii. 2: also John v. 18), as unto the Lord (i.e. ‘in obeying your husbands, obey the Lord:’ not merely as in all things we are to have regard to Him, but because, as below expanded, the husband stands peculiarly in Christ’s place. But he is not thus identified in power with Christ, nor the obedience, in its nature, with that which is owed to Him). For an husband (any husband, taken as an example) is head of his wife, as also (introducing identity of category) Christ is head of the church (see for the sentiment, 1 Cor. xi. 3 note), (being, in His case—see below) Himself Saviour of the Body (i.e. ‘in Christ’s case the Headship is united with, nay gained by, His having SAVED the body in the process of Redemption: so that I am not alleging Christ’s Headship as one entirely identical with that other, for He has a claim to it and office in it peculiar to Himself.’ “The man is not the saviour of his wife: in that, Christ excels him: hence ‘nevertheless’ follows.” Bengel).

24.] Nevertheless (what I do say is, that notwithstanding this difference, thus far the two Headships are to be regarded as identical, in the subjection of the body to the Head) as the church is subjected to Christ, so also (again, identity of category) let the wives be to their husbands in every thing.

25.] I cannot refrain from citing Chrysostom’s very beautiful remarks on this next passage:—“You see the rule of obedience? Well, hear also the rule of love. Do you wish your wife to obey you, as the Church obeys Christ? Then take care for her, as Christ did for the Church: and even if you must give your life for her, or be cut in a thousand pieces, or whatever you must undergo and suffer, shrink not from it: and even if you suffer all this, you have not yet done

love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it; <sup>26</sup> that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, <sup>27</sup> that he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish. <sup>28</sup> So ought men to love their any thing that Christ did: for you do this being already joined in marriage to her, but He suffered for a Bride who rejected and hated Him. As then He brought to His feet her who rejected Him and hated Him and scorned Him and despised Him, with wonderful care and affection, not with terror, not with threats, nor with any thing of the sort; so do you towards your wife: if you see her despising you, scornful you, treating you with contempt, you can bring her to your feet by spending care on her, love, and kindness. No bonds are more despotic than these, and especially between man and wife. A slave a man may perhaps bind by terror; but nay, not even him, for he soon will escape and be free: but the partner of your life, the mother of your children, the subject of all your joy, you ought to bind not by terror and threats, but by love and gentle consideration."

Husbands, love your wives, as also (see above) Christ loved the church, and gave Himself for her (better than 'it'; the comparison is thus brought out as in the original); <sup>26.]</sup> that (intermediate purpose, as regarded her; see below, ver. 27) He might sanctify her, having purified her by the laver (not 'washing,' as A. V.: a meaning the word never has: but the laver or font) of the water (of which we all know: viz. the baptismal water, see Titus iii. 5. We can hardly set aside the reference to the purifying bath of the bride previous to marriage:—see below on ver. 27, and compare Rev. xxi. 2) in the word (what word? "In the name of the Father, and Son, and Holy Ghost," says Chrysostom, alluding to the formula in Baptism: and so many Fathers:—others say, on which Baptism rests:—others, the preached word of faith [Rom. x. 8] of which confession is made in baptism, and which carries the real cleansing [John xv. 3; xvii. 17] and regenerating power [1 Pet. i. 23; iii. 21 (?)—so Augustine, who uses those memorable words,—"Take away the word, and what is water but water? The word is added to the element, and it becomes a sacrament, as it were the word made visible." And this certainly seems the sense most analogous to St. Paul's usage. Thus, the word, preached and received, is the conditional element of purification,—the real water of spiritual baptism;—that wherein and whereby alone the efficacy of baptism is conveyed—that wherein and whereby we are regenerated, the process of sanctification being subsequent and gradual),

<sup>27.]</sup> that (further purpose of His giving Himself for her) He might Himself present unto Himself (as a bride, see 2 Cor. xi. 2: not as a sacrifice, which is quite against the context. The expression sets forth that the preparation of the Church for her bridal with Christ is exclusively by His own agency) the church glorious, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any of such things; but that she may be holy (perfect in holiness) and blameless (see on both, note, ch. i. 4). The presentation here spoken of is clearly, in its full sense, that future one at the Lord's coming, so often treated under the image of a marriage (Matt. xxii. 1 ff.; xxv. 1 ff.; Rev. xix. 7 ff.; xxi. 2, &c.), not any progress of sanctification here below.

<sup>28.]</sup> Thus (two ways of understanding this thus are open to us: 1) as referring back to Christ's love for the church,—"Thus,' 'in like manner,' &c., as [being] 'their own bodies:' and 2) as referring forward to the similitude below,—"Thus,' 'so,' &c., 'as [they love] their own bodies.' After weighing maturely what has been said on one side and the other, I cannot but decide for the latter, as most in accordance with the usage of St. Paul and with ver. 33: also as more simple. The sense remains substantially the same, and answers much better to the comment furnished by the succeeding clauses:—husbands ought to love their own wives as they love their own bodies [i.e., themselves: for their wives are in fact part of their own bodies, ver. 31]: this being illustrated by and referred to the great mystery of Christ and His church, in which the same love, and the same incorporation, has place) ought the husbands also (as well as Christ in the archetypal example just given) to love their own (emphatic: see above on ver. 22) wives as (with the same affection as) their own bodies. He that loveth his own (see above) wife loveth himself (is but complying with that universal law of nature by which we all love ourselves. As the woman owed her natural being to the man, her source and head, so we owe our entire spiritual being to Christ, our source and head: and as the woman was one flesh with the man in this natural relation, so we in our entire spiritual relation, body, soul, and Spirit, are one with Christ, God manifested in our humanity,—parts and members of His glorified Body). 31.] For this cause (the allusion, or rather free citation, is still carried on: compare Gen. ii. 24:—i. e. because we are members of Him in the sense just insisted on. This whole verse is said [see on ver. 32 below] not of human marriages, but of Christ and the church. HE is the man in the Apostle’s view here, the Church is the woman. I would regard the saying as applied to that, past, present, and future, which constitutes Christ’s Union to His Bride the Church: His leaving the Father’s bosom, which is past—His gradual preparation of the union, which is present: His full consummation of it, which is future. This seems to me to be necessary, because we are as truly now one flesh with Him, as we shall be, when heaven and earth shall ring with the joy of the nuptials;—and hence the exclusive future sense is inapplicable. In this allegorical sense most of the ancients, and the best of the moderns, interpret: and Eadie would have done well to study more deeply the spirit of the context before he characterized it as ‘strange romance,’ ‘wild and visionary,’ and said, ‘there is no hint that the Apostle intends to allegorize.’ That allegory, on the contrary, is the key to the whole) shall a man leave father and mother, and shall be closely joined to his wife, and they two shall become (see Matt. xix. 5, note) one flesh (“not only, as they were before, in respect of their origin, but in respect of their new conjunction.” Bengel).

32.] This mystery is great (viz. the matter mystically alluded to in the Apostle’s application of the text just quoted: the mystery of the spiritual union of Christ with our humanity, typified by the close conjunction of the marriage state. This meaning of mystery, which is strictly that in which St. Paul uses the word,—as something passing human comprehension, but revealed as a portion of the divine dealings in Christ,—is, it seems to me, required by the next words. It is irksome, but necessary, to notice the ridiculous perversion of this text by the Romish church, which from the Vulgate rendering, deduces that ‘marriage is a great sacrament in Christ and in His Church.’ It will be enough to say that this their foolish blunder of “sacrament” for “mystery,” had long ago been exposed by their own Commentators, Cajetan and Estius; but I (emphatic) say (allege) it with reference to Christ and [with reference to] the church (i. e. my meaning, in citing the above text, is to call your attention, not to mere human marriage, but to that high and mysterious relation between Christ and His Church, of which that other is but a faint resemblance).

33.] Nevertheless (not to go further into the mystical bearings of the subject) you also (as well as Christ) every one, let each so love his own wife as himself; and the wife (in the making out of the sentence, a verb must be supplied:—but the wife, for her part,—‘I order,’ or, ‘let her see’), that she fear (so literally: Ecumenius says, “As a wife ought to fear, not as a slave”) her husband.

CH. VI. 1—4.] See on ch. v. 22.—Duties of children and parents. Children, obey your parents [in the Lord (i. e. Christ: the sphere in which the action is to take place, as usual: in the Lord belonging to obey your parents, not to the words your parents (“your parents in the Lord”), nor can this be combined, as a second reference, with the other, as Origen does, understanding ‘your fathers in the faith,’ “as Paul was of the Corinthians.” I should venture however to question whether the Apostle’s view was to hint that such commands of parents as might not be according to the will of God, should not be obeyed, as is very generally supposed: for in Col. iii. 20 he says, “Obey your parents in all things.” I should rather believe, that he regards both parents and children as in the Lord, and the commands, as well as the obedience, as having that sphere and element. How children were to regard commands not answering to this description, would be understood from the nature of the case: but it seems to violate the simplicity of this passage, which proceeds on the general principle of being subject to one another, to introduce into it a by-thought of this kind): for this is right (many regard the word right as explained by the next verse, and meaning according to the law of God. But it seems rather an appeal to the first principles of natural duty; that we should render obedience to those from whom we have received life).

2.] Honour thy father and thy mother; for such is the first commandment (in the Decalogue, which naturally stands at the head of all God’s other commandments; and which, though not formally binding on us as Christians, is quoted, in matters of eternal obligation [not of positive enactment], as an eminent example of God’s holy will) with a promise (i. e. with a special promise attached. The occurrence of the description of God as ‘shewing mercy unto thousands, &c.,’ after the second commandment, does not, as Jerome and others have thought, present any difficulty—for that is no special promise attached to the commandment. Nor does the fact that no other commandment occurs in the decatalogue with a promise);

3.] that it may be well with thee, and thou be long-lived upon the earth (he paraphrases the latter portion of the commandment: thus adapting the promise to his Christian readers, by taking away from it that which is special and peculiar to the Jewish people. It is surely a mistake to spiritualize the promise, and understand by the earth, the heavenly Canaan. The very fact of the omission of the special clause, "which the Lord thy God giveth thee," removes the words from the region of type into undoubted reality: and when we remember that the persons addressed are "children," we must not depart from the simplest sense of the words).

4.] And, ye fathers (the mothers being included, as in subjugation to their own husbands: these last being the fountains of domestic rule: not for any other less worthy reason, to which the whole view of the sexes by the Apostle is opposed), irritate not ("as," says Chrysostom, "the generality do, disinheriting them, and driving them from their houses, and abusing them with coarse language, as if they were slaves, and not free." But the Apostle seems rather to allude to provoking by vexatious commands, and unreasonable blame, and uncertain temper, in ordinary intercourse: compare Col. iii. 21) your children; but bring them up in (as the sphere and element) the discipline and admonition (the first word is wrongly rendered "nurture" by the A. V.: it imports discipline by means of punishment, and the second implies "training by word—by the word of encouragement, when no more is wanted; of remonstrance, reproof, or blame where these are required." Trench) of the Lord (i. e. Christ: either objective,—"concerning the Lord;" or subjective,—"such as the Lord approves and dictates by His Spirit").

5—9.] See on ch. v. 22.—Duties of masters and slaves.

5.] Slaves (or, "bondmen." There is no reason to render this word "servants," as in A. V., for by this much of the Apostle's exhortation is deprived of point), obey your lords according to the flesh (Chrysostom sees in these words, according to the flesh, a consolatory hint that the lordship over them is temporary and of short duration: Calvin, that their real liberty was still their own: Ellicott, in citing these, rightly observes, that however they may be doubted, still both, especially the latter, are obviously deductions which must have been made, and which the Apostle might have intended to have been made), with fear and trembling (see note on 1 Cor. ii. 3: whence it appears that the fear and trembling was to be not that of dread, arising from their condition as slaves, but that of anxiety to do their duty,—"anxious reverence, which will be the fruit of simplicity of heart," as Calvin says), in (as its element) simplicity (singleness of view) of your heart, as to Christ (again—He being the source and ground of all Christian motives and duties);

6.] not in a spirit of (according to, measuring your obedience by) eyeservice (i. e. service while the master's eye is on them, and then only. Xenophon relates an anecdote of a king who, having bought a capital horse, asked some skilful horsekeeper what would get him as soon as possible into good condition. The horsekeeper answered, "His master's eye"), as menpleasers; but as bondmen of Christ

(the contrast is between with eyeservice and as bondmen of Christ; and doing the will of God is a qualification of bondmen of Christ), doing the will of God (serving not a seen master only [as the eye-servant does], but the great invisible Lord of all, which will be the surest guarantee for your serving your earthly masters, even when unseen), 7.] from your soul (so literally) with good will doing service (this arrangement, which is that of most of the ancient and principal moderns, seems to me far better than the other, as in A. V., which joins "from the heart" to "doing the will of God." For 1) these words need here no such qualification as "from the heart:" if the will of God be the real object of the man's obedience, that it is not an eye-service will be sufficiently ensured, whereas 2) the double qualification, "from the heart with good will," attached to doing service, describes beautifully the source in himself [from the heart] and the accompanying feeling towards another [with good will] of Christian service), as to the Lord, and not to men; 8.] knowing (as ye do; i.e. seeing that ye are aware) that each man, if he shall have done (at Christ's coming) any good thing (the reading is in some doubt. The sense comes to the same, whether it be read thus, or as the A. V., 'whatsoever good thing any man doeth.' But it must be, on either reading, each man shall have done), this (emphatic: 'this in full,' 'this exactly') he shall receive (see reff., where the same expression occurs—this he shall then receive in its value as then estimated, —changed, so to speak, into the currency of that new and final state) from the Lord (Christ), whether he be slave or free. Chrysostom beautifully gives the connexion of thought: "Hence it was probable that many masters, being unbelievers, would not pay regard to nor require their slaves for their obedience: see how he consoled them, that they might not be distressed at their requital, but be of good courage, respecting their ultimate reward. For just as those who receive a benefit, if they be not grateful to their benefactors, make God a debtor to them: so in this case the masters, if you treat them well and they make you no return, have in fact made a greater return, by making God your debtor." 9.] And, ye masters, do the same things (i.e. act analogously, as they are to remember one whom they serve, so [below] are ye—and, mutatis mutandis, to act to them as they to you) with regard to them, forbearing your (usual: such as most masters do use) threatening: knowing (as ye do, see ver. 8) that both of them and of yourselves the Master is in the heavens; and respect of persons (warping of justice from regard to any man's individual pre-eminence) exists not with Him.

10—20.] General exhortation to the spiritual conflict and to prayer. 10.] Henceforth (Olshausen's remark, that the Apostle never addresses his readers as brethren in this Epistle, is perfectly correct: ver. 23 does not contravene it [as Eadie], but rather establishes it. power of his might (see on ch. i. 19).

11.] Put on the entire armour (emphatic: repeated again ver. 13: offensive, as well as defensive. It is probable that the Apostle was daily familiarized in his imprisonment with the Roman method of arming) of God (i. e. as supplied, ministered by God), that ye may be able to stand against the schemes (the original word here also occurs in ch. iv. 14) of the devil.

12.] For (confirms the purpose just stated) our (or, 'your': the ancient authorities are divided) wrestling (this must be literally taken—it is a hand to hand and foot to foot 'tug of war'—that in which the combatants close, and wrestle for the mastery) is not (Meyer well remarks, that the negative is not to be softened down into not so much, or not only, as Grotius, &c.—the conflict which the Apostle means is absolutely not with men, but &c. Augustine says, "Our struggle is not against flesh and blood," i. e. against men, whom you see raging against you. "They are vessels, which another uses: instruments, which another touches") against flesh and blood, but (see above) against the governments, against the powers (see note on ch. i. 21), against the world-rulers (compare John xii. 31 note; xiv. 30; xvi. 11; 2 Cor. iv. 4; 1 John v. 19) of this (present state of) darkness (see ch. ii. 2; v. 8, 11), against the spiritual (armies) of wickedness in the heavenly places (what is the meaning? Chrysostom connects in the heavenly places with "our wrestling is"—saying, "It is in heavenly matters that our fight takes place." Others do the same, understanding the heavenly places, properly so called, as the scene of the combat. "But how can the heavenly places, the scenes of divine blessing, of Christ's exaltation, &c., be the seat or abode of impure fiends?" But if they are "the scene of" our "combat" with these fiends, how can our enemies be any where else but in them? Two ways then remain: to join the words in the heavenly places a) with the spiritual hosts of wickedness—b) with wickedness only. And in my Greek Testament I have concluded, on account of the form of the Greek sentence, that the former of these is preferable. And in sense, if properly understood, it is unobjectionable. That habitation of the evil spirits, which in ch. ii. 2 was said, when speaking of mere matters of fact, to be in the air, is, now that the difficulty and importance of the Christian conflict is being forcibly set forth, represented as "in the heavenly places"—over us, and too strong for us without the panoply of God).

13.] Wherefore (since our foes are in power too mighty for us,—and in dwelling, around and above us) take up (so literally: but not 'to the battle,' but 'to put it on') the entire armour of God (see on ver. 11), that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day (not as Chrysostom, who makes the evil day mean the present life:—for then the evil day would be upon the Christian before he has on the armour. The right interpretation is well given by Bengel—"The war is perpetual: the fight rages less on one day, more on another. It is the evil day, on the approach of death, or during life: longer or shorter, varying in itself, where the evil one attacks us and his malignant hosts infest us, ver. 12"), and having accomplished all things (requisite to the combat: being Gurnall's notion [Christian Armour, vol. i. p. 378], that 'the girdle is used as an ornament, put on uppermost, to cover the joints of the armour, which would, if seen, cause some uncomeliness,' is against the context, and against the use of the phrase to gird the loins in the New Test.), and having put on the breastplate of righteousness (see Isa. in the refl., and Wisd. v. 19. ## 21—24.] CONCLUSION OF THE EPISTLE.

21.] But (transition to another subject: the contrast being between his more solemn occupations just spoken of, and his personal welfare) that ye also (the also may have two meanings: 1) as I have been going at length into the matters concerning you, so if you also on your part, wish to know my matters, &c.: 2) it may relate to some others whom the same messenger was to inform, and to whom he had previously written. If so, it would be an argument for the priority of the Epistle to the Colossians: for that was sent by Tychicus, and a similar sentiment occurs there, iv. 7. But I prefer the former meaning) may know the matters concerning me, how I fare (not, 'what I am doing;' he was always doing one thing), Tychicus (Acts xx. 4. Col. iv. 7. 2 Tim. iv. 12. Tit. iii. 12. He appears in the first-cited place amongst St. Paul's companions to Asia from Corinth, classed with Trophimus as Asiatics. Nothing more is known of him) shall make known all to you, the beloved brother and faithful (trustworthy) servant (or, minister; the original is diaconos: 'minister' must not lead to the idea of Estins, who says, on the words in the Lord,—"It is hence fairly presumed, that Tychicus was in the holy orders of deacon: see Col. iv. 7, and note there") in the Lord (belongs to minister, not to both brother and minister. He ministered in the Lord, Christ's work being the field on which his labour was bestowed); 22.] whom I sent to you for this very purpose (not, 'for the same purpose,' as A. V.), that ye may know the matters respecting us (see Col. iv. 8, where this verse occurs word for word, but with "that he may know your affairs" for these words. Does not this variation bear the mark of genuineness with it? The "us" are those mentioned Col. iv. 10), and that he may comfort (we need not assign a reason why they wanted comfort:—there would probably be many in those times of peril) your hearts.

23.] Peace (need not be further specified, as is done by some:—the Epistle has no special conciliatory view. It is sufficiently described by being peace from God) to the brethren (of the Church or Churches addressed: see Introd. to this Epistle, § ii.: not as addressed to the Jews, and the next verse to the Gentiles: for least of all in this Epistle would such a distinction be found), and love with faith (faith is perhaps presupposed as being theirs: and he prays that love may always accompany it, see Gal. v. 6: or both are invoked on them, see 1 Tim. i. 14), from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ (see note on Rom. i. 7). 24.] General benediction on all who love Christ: corresponding with the malediction on all who love Him not, 1 Cor. xvi. 22. May the grace (so literally: viz. of God, which comes by Christ) be with all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in incorruptibility (i.e. whose love is incorruptible. The way to explain this difficult expression will be to endeavour to find some clue to the idea in the Apostle's mind. He speaks, in Col. ii. 22, of worldly things which become corrupt with the using. Incorruptible is with him an epithet of God [Rom. i. 23. 1 Tim. i. 17]: the dead are raised incorruptible [1 Cor. xv. 52]: the Christian's crown is incorruptible [1 Cor. ix. 25]. The word always elsewhere in N. T. signifies the incorruptibility of future immortality. If we seek elsewhere in the Epistles for an illustration of the term as applied to inward qualities, we find a close parallel in 1 Pet. iii. 4; where the ornament of women is to be "the hidden man of the heart, in the incorruptibility of a meek and quiet spirit"—the contrast being between the "corruptible things, gold and silver," and the incorruptible graces of the renewed spiritual man. I believe we are thus led to the meaning here;—that the love spoken of is in incorruptibility;—in, as its sphere and element and condition, incorruptibility—not a fleeting earthly love, but a spiritual and eternal one. And thus only is the word worthy to stand as the crown and climax of this glorious Epistle: whereas in the ordinary [A. V.] rendering, 'sincerity,'—besides that this does not give the meaning of the Greek word,—the Epistle would end with an anti-climax, by lowering the high standard which it has lifted up throughout to an apparent indifferentism, and admitting to the apostolic blessing all those, however otherwise wrong, who are only not hypocrites in their love of Christ).

CHAP. I. 1, 2.] ADDRESS AND GREET-ING.

1.] Timothy seems to be named as being well known to the Philippians (Acts xvi. 3, 10 ff.), and present with St. Paul at this time. The mention is merely formal, as the Apostle proceeds (ver. 3) in the first person singular. Certainly no official character is intended to be given by it, as some have thought: for of all the Epistles, this is the least official: and those to the Romans and Galatians, where no such mention occurs, the most so. Observe, there is no title of Apostle subjoined to Paul (as in Col. i. 1), probably because the Philippians needed no such reminiscence of his authority. Compare also 1 and 2 Thess. all] both here and in vv. 4, 7, 8, 25; ch. ii. 17, 26, is best accounted for from the warm affection which breathes through this whole Epistle (see on ver. 3), not from any formal reason, as that the Apostle wishes to put those Philippians who had not sent to his support, on a level in his affection with those who had,—that he wishes to set himself above all their party divisions (ch. ii. 3): &c. with the bishops] Theodoret remarks, “He calls the presbyters, bishops: for at that time they had both names,”—and alleges Acts xx. 28, Tit. i. 5, 7, as shewing the same. See on the whole subject, note on Acts xx. 17. and deacons] See on Rom. xii. 7; xvi. 1.—Chrysostom enquires why he writes here to the clergy as well as to the saints, and not in the Epistles to the Romans, or Corinthians, or Ephesians. And he answers it, “because they had joined in sending to the Apostle, and had borne fruit for him, and themselves had sent Epaphroditus to him.” But the true reason seems to be, the late date of our Epistle. The ecclesiastical offices were now more plainly distinguished than at the time when the two former of those Epistles were written. That to the Ephesians rests on grounds of its own.—The simple juxtaposition of the officers with the members of the Church, and indeed their being placed after those members, shews, as it seems to me, the absence of hierarchical views such as those in the Epistles of the apostolic fathers. 2.] See on Rom. i. 7.

4.] always—every—for you all—here we have the overflowings of a full heart. The sense is, that every time he prayed, he joyfully offered up that portion of his prayers which was an intercession for them.

5.] for (ground of the last assertion) your fellowship (with one another: entire accord, unanimous action: not your fellowship with me) as regards the Gospel (not ‘in the Gospel,’ as A. V. Their mutual accord was for the purposes of the Gospel—i. e. the perfecting, of which he proceeds to treat. The expression “your fellowship as regards the Gospel” may include without expressly mentioning their contribution (ch. iv. 15) to the Apostle’s necessity:—that particular manifestation of this fellowship, which so especially marked the liberal and warm-hearted Christians of Philippi) from the first day (of your receiving it) until now;

6.] being (i. e. seeing I am) confident of this very thing (it points out sharply and emphatically, implying, as here, that the very matter of confidence is one which will ensure the success of the prayer), that He who began in you a good work (viz. God: compare ch. ii. 13.—By ‘a good work,’ he refers his confidence to the general character of God as the doer and finisher of good: the one good work in his mind, being their fellowship, &c.—The words up to the day of Jesus Christ assume the nearness of the coming of the Lord. Here, as elsewhere, Commentators (even Ellicott recently) have endeavoured to escape from this inference. Thus Theophylact and Ecumenius refer the saying not only to the then existing generation of Philippians, but also to their descendants: Estius, in the case of each man, “up to his own death.” Calovius, understanding not the continuance till the day of Christ, but “term and complement of perfection which we shall possess at that day:” and so nearly Calvin, but saying very beautifully,—“Although they who are freed from the mortal body, no longer war with the lusts of the flesh, and are as they say beyond range of the enemy: yet there will be nothing out of place in speaking of them as still in progress, because they have not yet attained to the point at which they aspired: they are not yet in possession of the felicity and glory for which they hoped: in a word, the day has not yet dawned which is to reveal the treasures hidden in hope. And on this account, whenever hope is spoken of, the eyes must be fixed on the blessed resurrection as their point of reference.” Doubtless, this is our lesson, and must be our application of such passages: but this surely was not the sense in which the Apostle wrote them). 7.] Justification of the above-expressed confidence:—it was fair and right for him to entertain it.

to be thus minded] viz. with the confidence of ver. 6. for you all] because it is an opinion involving their good. you have me] The Greek will equally admit the rendering of the A. V.

But the context here clearly determines for the other. Their bearing him always in mind was the ground of his confidence that they were prospering in the Gospel.—His bonds were his situation: his defence and confirmation of the Gospel, his employment in that situation;—whether he refers to a public defence (2 Tim. iv. 16), or only to that defence of the Gospel, which he was constantly making in private. However this may be, the two, his defence and his confirmation, are most naturally understood as referring to one and the same course of action. One such defence and confirmation we have recorded in Acts xxviii. 23 ff. being partakers of my grace (the grace vouchsafed to me by God in Christ: not the grace of suffering in Him, as ver. 29, still less the grace of apostleship, Rom. i. 5, which the Philippians had furthered by their subsidies: ver. 8 decides the grace to be spiritual in its meaning). 8.] Confirmation of ver. 7. On the words, in the tender heart (literally, bowels) of Christ Jesus, Bengel remarks, “In Paul, it is not Paul that lives, but Christ Jesus: therefore Paul is moved, not in his own heart, but in that of Christ Jesus.” All real spiritual love is but a portion of the great love wherewith He hath loved us, which lives and yearns in all who are vitally united to Him.

9–11.] The substance of his prayer (already, ver. 4, alluded to) for them.

9.] And refers back to the prayer of ver. 4: ‘and this is the purport of my prayer.’ At the same time this purport follows most naturally, after the expression of desire for them in the last verse.

your love] not, ‘towards me,’—nor towards God and Christ, but either perfectly general, or, ‘towards one another:’ virtually identical with the “fellowship” of ver. 5. In the words, your love, its existence is recognized: in the prayer, that it may abound more and more, its deficiency is hinted at. in is not to be taken as if knowledge and perception were departments of Love, in which it was to increase; but they are rather elements, in whose increase in their characters Love is also, and as a separate thing, to increase: as if it had been said, ‘that your love may increase, but not without an increase in knowledge and perception.’ For by these Love is guarded from being ill-judged and misplaced, which, separate from them, it would be: and accordingly, on the increase of these is all the subsequent stress laid. knowledge means, accurate knowledge of moral and practical truth: perception, the power of apprehending the same: “the contrary of that dulness and inactivity of the inward senses, which brings about moral want of judgment, and indifference.” It has been well explained as moral tact. 10.]

Purpose of the increase in knowledge and perception: with a view to your distinguishing things that are more excellent (or, different), and so choosing the good, and refusing the evil. Which-ever meaning, more excellent or different, we choose, the thing to be done amounts to the same, the selection of the good.

without offence] i.e. not giving no offence (to others), but void of offence, or stumbling, yourselves. unto the day of Christ] See above on ver. 6: but unto is not exactly “up to,” it has more the meaning of “for,”—‘so that when that day comes, ye may be found.’ Our temporal use of ‘against’ exactly gives it

V., are to be taken together. They became known, not as a matter simply of notoriety, but of notoriety in Christ, i. e. in connexion with Christ's cause,—as endured for Christ's sake;—and thus the Gospel was furthered) in the whole prætorium (this may mean (1), the barrack of the prætorian guards attached to the palace of Nero. This idea seems supported by the greeting sent, ch. iv. 22, from "those of Cæsar's household," who would, it is said, hardly have been mentioned, had the prætorian camp (see below) been meant. The word here, 'prætorium,' is also used of castles or palaces belonging to Cæsar, or to foreign princes, or even to private persons: it cannot be shewn ever to have signified the palatium at Rome, but the above meanings approach so nearly to this, that no serious objection can be taken to it. The fact here mentioned may be traced to St. Paul being guarded by a prætorian soldier, and having full liberty of preaching the Gospel [Acts xxviii. 30 f.]: but more probably his situation had been changed since then,—see Introd. to this Epistle, § iii. 6.—But the expression may also be taken (2) in its larger acceptation,—the quadrangular camp now forming part of Aurelian's city walls,—including also the smaller camp on the Palatine. And this seems favoured by the words "in all the palace" (prætorium), and to all others), and to all others (literally, the rest, a popular hyperbole:—i. e., to others, besides those in the prætorium: not to be taken, as A. V., as signifying, 'in all other places.' The matter-of-fact interpretation would be, that the soldiers, and those who visited him, carried the fame of his being bound for Christ over all Rome);

14.] and (so) that most of (not 'many of,' as A. V.) the brethren in the Lord (this is the most natural connexion, and not that maintained by some, "trusting in the Lord by my bonds"), encouraged by (having confidence in) my bonds ("for if the preaching were not of God, said they, Paul would not have endured to be bound for it." Eusebius), are venturing more abundantly (than

"brethren in the Lord" above, but the first are a new class, over and beyond those brethren, and the second are identical with the brethren above. The first were the anti-pauline Christians, of whom we hear so often in the Epistles (see Rom. xiv. ; 1 Cor. iii. 10 ff. ; iv. 15 ; ix. 1 ff. ; 2 Cor. x. 1 ff. ; xi. 1 ff. &c.).

These last indeed (preach Christ: omitted, as having just occurred: see below) out of (induced by) love, knowing (motive of their conduct) that I am set (not 'lie in prison':—'am appointed by God') for the defence (as in ver. 7; see note there: helping me in the solemn matter of my account of my ministry to God) of the Gospel: 17.] but the former out of self-seeking (or 'intrigue': not 'contention,' as A. V., which has arisen from a mistake as to the derivation of the word, see note, Rom. ii. 8) proclaim Christ, insincerely, thinking (explains their insincerity;—'in that they think.' In this expression is involved, 'they do not succeed in their purpose') to raise up tribulation for (me in) my bonds (i. e. endeavouring to take opportunity, by my being laid aside, to depreciate me and my preaching, and so to cause me trouble of spirit). 18.] What then (i. e. 'what is my feeling thereupon?') nevertheless (literally except that: i. e. "nothing, except that:" notwithstanding this opposition to myself; it has no other result, than . . .), in every way (of preaching;—from whatever motive undertaken and however carried out), in pretext (with a by-motive, as in ver. 17), or in verity ('truth and sincerity of spirit'), Christ is proclaimed (then these adversaries of the Apostle can hardly have been those against whom he speaks so decisively in Gal., and indeed in our ch. iii. 2. These men preached Christ, and thus forwarded, so far, the work of the Gospel, however mixed their motives may have been, or however imperfect their work); and in this I rejoice, yea, and I shall (hereafter) rejoice;

Were the sense as A. V., and ordinarily, 'through your prayer and the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ,' the form of the original would have been different. How such a meaning can be doctrinally objectionable, I am wholly unable to see. Surely, that intercessory prayer should attain its object, and the supply take place in consequence of the prayer, is only in accord with the simplest idea of any reality in such prayer at all.—By a delicate touch at the same time of personal humility and loving appreciation of their spiritual eminence and value to him, he rests the advancement of his own salvation on the supply of the Holy Spirit won for Him by their prayers), <sup>20.</sup>] according to (for it is 'our confidence, which hath great recompense of reward,' Heb. x. 35 f.) my expectation (not, as A. above, ver. 17) Christ shall be magnified (shewn to be what He is: by His kingdom being spread among men: it is more than 'praised') in my body (my body being the subject of life or death,—in the occurrence of either of which he would not be ashamed, the one bringing active service for Christ, the other union with Him in heaven, ver. 21 ff.), either by (means of) life or by (means of) death.

All my life, all my energy, all my time, is His—I live Christ), and to die (literally, to have died; the act of living is to him Christ; but it is the state after death, not the act of dying, which is gain to him) (is) gain. This last word has surprised some Commentators, expecting a repetition of Christ, or something at all events higher than mere gain. But it is to be explained by the foregoing context. 'Even if my death should be the result of my enemies' machinations, it will be no shame to me, but gain, and my boldness is secured even for that event.'

The former is I think preferable, both on account of the one spirit and one soul, which naturally prepare the mind for an united effort, and because his own share in the contest comes in as a new element in ver. 30) for the faith (compare Jude 3). <sup>28.</sup> The adversaries, from the comparison which follows with his own conflict, and the suffering in Christ's behalf spoken of in the next verse, must be the adversaries of the faith, whether Jews or Gentiles, compare 1 Cor. xvi. 9.

CHAP. II. 1—11.] Exhortation to unity and humility (1—4), after the example of Christ (5—11).

1.] He introduces in the fervour of his affection ("see how persistently, how vehemently, with what earnest sympathy," Chrysostom) four great points of the Christian life and ministry, and by them enforces his exhortation. The four fall into two pairs, in each of which we have first the objective principle of Christian life (in Christ,—of the Spirit), and next the subjective principle "of love,"—tenderness and compassions. And thus the awakening of motives by these four points is at the same time powerful and touching. The first particular mentioned is here, exhortation, not "consolation," which follows in the word comfort. in Christ specifies the element of the exhortation. The Greek word, paraklêsis, signifies both exhortation and consolation: see Acts iv. 36. of love is the subjective genitive,—'consolation furnished by love.' communion,—fellowship, of the Holy Spirit; compare 2 Cor. xiii. 13;

with xvii. 5. "The divine nature had an infinite beauty in itself, even without any creature to look on it." Bengel. See also Col. i. 15; 2 Cor. iv. 4. That the divine nature of Christ is not here meant, is clear : for He did not with reference to this empty Himself, (ver. 7), deemed not his equality with God a matter for grasping (on the difficulty of the rendering, and the reasons for pressing that here adopted, see in my Greek Test. The meaning is plain enough. Our Lord possessed equality with God. In "the mind which was in Him, He regarded not this His equality a thing to be grasped at by Him, so as to hold it firm for Himself, but" &c. We have now to enquire, whether the opening of the passage will bear to be understood of our Lord already incarnate. De Wette and others have maintained that the name Christ Jesus cannot apply to Him before His Incarnation. But the answer to this is easy, viz. that that name applies to the entire historical Person of our Lord, of whom the whole passage is said, and not merely to Him in his præ-existent state. That one and the same person of the Son of God, "existing in the form of God," afterwards "became in the likeness of men," gathering to itself the humanity, in virtue of which He is now designated in the concrete, Christ Jesus. The dispute seems to me to be satisfactorily settled by the contrast between the two clauses just quoted. These two cannot belong to Christ in the same incarnate state. Therefore the former of them must refer to his præ-incarnate state, 7.] but emptied Himself (Himself is the emphatic word, not the verb.—He not only did not enrich himself, but he emptied himself:—He used His equality with God as an opportunity, not for self-exaltation, but for self-abasement. And the word simply and literally means, emptied. He emptied Himself of the form of God [not His essential glory, but its manifested possession : see on the words above : the glory which He had with the Father before the world began, John xvii. 5, and which He resumed at His glorification]—He ceased, while in this state of exinanition, to reflect the glory which He had with the Father), [by] taking the form of a servant (specification of the method in which He emptied Himself. The term servant is contrasted with 'equality with God'—and imports 'a servant of God,'—not a servant generally, nor a servant of man and God. And this state, of a servant of God, is further defined by what follows), being made (by birth into the world,—'becoming') in the likeness of men (compare Rom. viii. 3. He was not a man pure and simple, and nothing else, but the Son of God manifest in the flesh and nature of men. The expression, in the likeness, is forcible, in giving another subordinate specification, viz. that He was made in like form to men, who are servants of God).

8.] (the term, being found, serves to denote the taking up afresh of the subject, and introducing a new portion of the history. Hitherto of the act of laying aside the form of God, specified to have consisted in taking the form of a servant, and being made in the likeness of men. But now we take Him up again, this having past ; we find Him in his human appearance—and what then ? we have further acts of self-humiliation to relate) : and when He was (having been) found in habit (guise, outward semblance ; e.g. of look, and dress, and speech. The term is a more specific repetition of "in the likeness" above : and is here emphatic : 'being found in habit, &c.—He did not stop with this outward semblance, but . . .') as a man (for He was not a man, but God [in Person], with the humanity taken on him : "As a man : for this was the nature which He took up into Him : He himself was not this, but He put this on." The stress here is on the verb, not on "himself:" in ver. 7 the weight rested on the reflexive reference of the act, but here it rests on the reflexive act itself [by] becoming (this participle specifies, wherein the humiliation consisted) obedient (to God; as before in the term servant. See Rom. v. 19, Heb. v. 8 f., and ver. 9,—"wherefore God also,"—referring to the words "to God," here understood) even unto (as far as) death (the climax of His obedience. Unto death must not be taken with "humbled himself," which breaks the sentence awkwardly), and that (death) the death of the cross (i. e., "that accursed death, and appropriated to the worst of criminals." Theophylact).

9—11.] Exaltation of Jesus, consequent on this His humiliation :—brought forward as an encouragement to follow His example. "He proves by Christ's example, that they are blessed who voluntarily humiliate themselves with Christ: for from the most despised estate to the most exalted height, whoever humbles himself shall be in like manner exalted. Who then will refuse that submission by which he may rise to the glory of the heavenly kingdom?" Calvin. 9.]

Wherefore (i. e. on account of this His self-humiliation and obedience: see Heb. ii. 9, note. But we must always bear in mind, that herein Christ was not a man, nor an example what we can do, but the eternal Son of God, lowering Himself to take the nature of men, and in it rendering voluntary and perfect obedience) also (introduces the result, Luke i. 35) God (on His part: on the reference, see on the word "obedient") highly exalted Him (not only exalted, but highly exalted; His exaltation being a super-eminent one. Not, as A. V. above, 'hath highly exalted;' the reference is to an historical fact, viz. that of His Ascension), and gave to Him (the Father being greater than the incarnate Son, John xiv. 28, and having by His exaltation of Jesus to His throne, freely bestowed on him the kingly office, which is the completion of His Mediatorship, Rom. xiv. 9) the name which is above every name (the word must be kept, against most Commentators, to its plain sense of NAME,—and not rendered 'glory,' or understood of His office. The name is, the very name which He bore in His humiliation, but which now is the highest and most glorious of all names, the name of JESUS. Compare His own answer in glory, Acts ix. 5, "I am JESUS, whom thou persecutest") : 10.] that (intent of this exaltation) in the name of Jesus (emphatic, as the ground and element of the act which follows) every knee should bend (i. e. all prayer should be made [not, as A. V., 'at the name of Jesus every knee should bow,'—which the words of the original will not bear]. But what prayer? to JESUS, or to GOD THROUGH HIM? The only way to answer this question is to regard the general aim of the passage. This undoubtedly is, the exaltation of Jesus. The clause, "to the glory of God the Father," below, is no deduction from this, but rather an additional reason why we should carry on the exaltation of Jesus until this new particular is introduced. This would lead us to infer that the universal prayer is to be to JESUS. And this view is confirmed by the next clause, where every tongue is to confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, when we remember the common expression, "to call upon the name of the Lord," for prayer: Rom. x. 12 f.; 1 Cor. i. 2 [2 Tim. ii. 22]; Acts [vii. 59] ix. 14, 21; xxii. 16), of those in heaven (angels. Eph. i. 20, 21. Heb. i. 6) and those on earth (men) and those under the earth (the dead); 11.] and that every tongue (of all the classes just named) should confess (result of the bending of

Him (the Father being greater than the incarnate Son, John xiv. 28, and having by His exaltation of Jesus to His throne, freely bestowed on him the kingly office, which is the completion of His Mediatorship, Rom. xiv. 9) the name which is above every name (the word must be kept, against most Commentators, to its plain sense of NAME,—and not rendered 'glory,' or understood of His office. The name is, the very name which He bore in His humiliation, but which now is the highest and most glorious of all names, the name of JESUS. Compare His own answer in glory, Acts ix. 5, "I am JESUS, whom thou persecutest") : 10.] that (intent of this exaltation) in the name of Jesus (emphatic, as the ground and element of the act which follows) every knee should bend (i. e. all prayer should be made [not, as A. V., 'at the name of Jesus every knee should bow,'—which the words of the original will not bear]. But what prayer? to JESUS, or to GOD THROUGH HIM? The only way to answer this question is to regard the general aim of the passage. This undoubtedly is, the exaltation of Jesus. The clause, "to the glory of God the Father," below, is no deduction from this, but rather an additional reason why we should carry on the exaltation of Jesus until this new particular is introduced. This would lead us to infer that the universal prayer is to be to JESUS. And this view is confirmed by the next clause, where every tongue is to confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, when we remember the common expression, "to call upon the name of the Lord," for prayer: Rom. x. 12 f.; 1 Cor. i. 2 [2 Tim. ii. 22]; Acts [vii. 59] ix. 14, 21; xxii. 16), of those in heaven (angels. "That the majesty of God may shine in Christ, and the Father be glorified in the Son; see John v. and xvii., and you will have the exposition of this place." Calvin).

12. So then] i. e. as a consequence on this pattern set you by Christ. The more obedient answers to "becoming obedient," ver. 8, and salvation to the exaltation of Christ. It is therefore better to refer "so then" to that which has just preceded, than to all the foregoing exhortations, ch. i. 27 ff. ye were obedient] i. e. to God, as Christ above: not as ordinarily, 'to me' or 'my Gospel.' The following clauses are to be connected not with this, but with "work out," &c., at the end of the verse.

as is by no means superfluous, but gives the sense not as if (it were a matter to be done) in my presence only, but now (as things are at present) much more (with more earnestness) in my absence (because spiritual help from me is withdrawn from you), carry out (bring to an accomplishment) your own (emphasis on your own, perhaps as directing attention to the example of Christ which has preceded,—as He obeyed and won His exaltation, so do you obey and carry out your own salvation) salvation (which is begun with justification by faith, but must be carried out, brought to an issue, by sanctification of the Spirit—a life of holy obedience and advance to Christian perfection. For this reason, the A. V.,

'work out your own salvation,' is bad, because ambiguous, giving the idea that the salvation is a thing to be gotten, brought in and brought about, by ourselves) with fear and trembling (lest you should fail of its accomplishment at the last. The expression indicates a state of anxiety and self-distrust. And the stress of the exhortation is on these words:—considering the immense sacrifice which Christ made for you, and the lofty eminence to which God hath now raised Him, be ye more than ever earnest that you miss not your own share in such salvation. The thought before the Apostle's mind is much the same as that in Heb. ii. 3).

13.] Encouragement to fulfil the last exhortation—for you are not left to yourselves, but have the almighty Spirit dwelling in you to aid you.—This working must not be explained away, with Pelagius, into "a mere persuasion and encouraging by promises:" it is an efficacious working which is here spoken of: God not only brings about the will, but creates the will—we owe both the will to do good, and the power, to His indwelling Spirit. in you, as in 1 Cor. xii. 6, and 2 Cor. iv. 12; Eph. ii. 2; Col. i. 29.

with men, than doubts respecting God or duty.

15.] The whole clause is a reminiscence of Deut. xxxii. 8. ye shine] indicative, not "shine ye," imperative: for this is the position of Christians in the world: see Matt. v. 14; Eph. v. 8. Not 'lights' merely, but luminaries, 'heavenly bodies.' But this can hardly be satisfactorily given in an English version.

16.] Probably as E. V., holding forth (to them, applying to them). for (result of your thus walking, as concerns myself) a matter of boasting for me against (temporal: reserved for) the day of Christ, that I did not run (the past tense is from the point of view of that day) for nothing, nor labour for nothing.

17, 18.] These verses are closely connected with the preceding; not as De Wette and others maintain, with ch. i. 26, which is most unnatural, and never would occur to any reader. The connexion is this: in ver. 16 he had tacitly assumed that he should live to witness their blameless conduct even till the day of Christ. Now he puts the other alternative—that the dangers which surrounded him would result in his death:—and in that case equally he rejoiced, &c.

17. Yea, if even] In the present case (see on the construction in my Greek Test.), the Apostle seems to believe the supposition which he makes: that it veritably will be so.

if I am even being poured out, because the danger was besetting him now, and waxing onward to its accomplishment. He uses the word literally, with reference to the shedding of his blood. "He represents his whole apostolic work for the faith of the Philippians, as a sacrifice: if he is put to death in the course of it, he will be, by the shedding of his blood, poured out as a libation upon this sacrifice, as among the Jews (Num. xxviii. 7; xv. 4 ff.) and heathens, in their sacrifices, libations of wine were usual, which were poured over the offerings." Meyer. ministration here means, priest's ministration at the sacrifice.

of your faith] your faith is the sacrifice, which I, as a priest, offer to God. The image is precisely as in Rom. xv. 16, where he is the priest, offering up the Gentiles to God. And the case which he puts is, that he, the priest, should have his own blood poured out at, upon his sacrificing and presentation to God of their faith.

I joy] not to be joined with "with you," but absolute, I rejoice for myself and congratulate you (not, 'rejoice with you,' as A. V. and many Commentators. Meyer well observes that the following verse is decisive against this: for if they rejoiced already, what need of "do ye also joy?"—congratulate you, viz. on the fact that I have been thus poured out for your faith, which would be an honour and a boast for you).

18.] And on the same account do ye joy (answer to his joy congratulation,—for this your honour), and congratulate me (answer to his joy above,—on this my joy).

CH. III. 1—IV. 1.] WARNING AGAINST CERTAIN JUDAIZERS,—ENFORCED BY HIS OWN EXAMPLE (1—16): ALSO AGAINST IMMORAL PERSONS (17—iv. 1).

1.] He appears to have been closing his Epistle (finally, &c.), but to have again gone off, on the vehement mention of the Judaizers, into an explanation of his strong term rendered concision. the same things]

It seems to me that Wiesinger has rightly apprehended the reference of this somewhat difficult sentence. The rejoice in the Lord, taken up again by the thus stand fast in the Lord, ch. iv. 1, is evidently put here emphatically, with direct reference to the warning which follows—let your joy (your boast) be in the Lord. And this same exhortation, rejoice, is in fact the ground-tone of the whole Epistle. See ch. i. 18, 25; ii. 17; iv. 4, where the addition “and again I say” seems to refer back again to this saying. So that there is no difficulty in imagining that the Apostle may mean by “the same things,” his exhortation to rejoice. The description of this course as being safe is no objection to this: because the rejoicing in the Lord is in fact an introduction to the warning which follows: a provision, by upholding the antagonist duty, against their falling into deceit. And thus all the speculation, whether the same things refer to a lost Epistle, or to words uttered when he was with them, falls to the ground. And the inference from Polycarp's words in his Epistles to these Philippians, “who (viz.

St. Paul) when absent wrote to you Epistles,” may be a true one, but does not belong here.

2. Beware of] more properly, observe, with a view to avoid: so “mark,” Rom. xvi. 17. the dogs] profane, impure persons. The appellation occurs in various references; but in the Jewish usage of it, uncleanness was the prominent idea; see Deut. xxiii. 18; Ps. xxii. 16; Isa. lvi. 10, 11; Matt. xv. 26, 27. Rev. xxii. 15. evil workers] or, workmen.

He seems to point out persons who actually wrought, and professedly for the Gospel, but who were ‘doing the work of evil,’ not mere ‘evil-doers.’ the concision]

Thus only, by a hardly intelligible English word, can we express the contemptuous term which the Apostle uses, reserving the honourable appellation of “the circumcision” for Christians, who only could truly be so called. Observe (i. e. in fact, Beware of) the (I will not say, circumcision, but mere) concision (“amputation”: who have no true circumcision of heart, but merely the cutting off of the flesh).

3.] For we are the real CIRCUMCISION (whether bodily circumcised, or not—there would be among them some of both sorts: see Rom. ii. 25, 29; Col. ii. 11), who worship (pay religious service and obedience) by the Spirit of God (see John iv. 23, 24. The Spirit of God is the agent, whereby our service is rendered: see Rom. v. 5; viii. 14; xii. 1; Heb. ix. 14. The emphasis is on it: for both profess a worship. Of God is expressed for solemnity), and glory in (stress on this,—are not ashamed of Him and seek our boast in circumcision, or the law, but make our boast in Him) Christ Jesus, and trust not in the flesh (‘but in the Spirit—in our union with Christ’).

Calvin well distinguishes between the real and apparent righteousness in the law—the former before God, never possessed by any man : the latter before men, here spoken of by Paul :—"He was therefore in men's judgment holy, and spotless from all legal blame. A rare praise, and almost singular : and yet let us see how much he esteemed it").

7.] But whatsoever things (emphatic and general : these above mentioned, and all others. The law itself is not included among them, but only his "gains" from this and other sources) were to me gains (different kinds of gain), these (emphatic) I have esteemed for Christ's sake (see it explained below, vv. 8, 9) as loss ("this one LOSS he saw in all of which he speaks : hence no longer the plural, losses," Meyer). 8.] But moreover (or, nay more, not only have I once for all passed this judgment, but I continue to count, &c. The contrast is of present judgment to his past one, mentioned above), I also continue to esteem [them]

This conformity with Christ's death was to take place by means of that perfect self-abjuration which he here asserts of himself—see Rom. viii. 29; 2 Cor. ii. 14; iv. 10 ff.; 1 Cor. xv. 31, and especially Gal. ii. 20); 11.] if by any means (the original expression is one used when an end is proposed, but failure is presumed to be possible. 12—14.] This seems to be inserted to prevent the misapprehension, that he conceived himself already to possess this knowledge, and to have grasped Christ in all His fulness.

12.] Not that (I do not mean, that . . .) I have already acquired (this having gained Christ: not the praise mentioned below, which is an image subsequently introduced, whereas the reference here must be to something foregoing; nor the resurrection, which has just been stated as an object of his wishes for the future: but as Calvin, "the entire participation of Christ's sufferings, the perfect experience of the power of His resurrection, the clear knowledge of Himself"), or am already completed (in spiritual perfection): but I pursue (the image of a runner in a course is already before him), if I may also (besides pressing on. We cannot express this double "also" in an English version) lay hold of that for which I was also laid hold of (for the sense, compare 1 Cor. xiii. 12. The time referred to when he was thus laid hold of by Christ, was his conversion: but we need not, as Chrysostom and others, press the image of the race, and regard him as flying, and overtaken) by Christ. 13.] Emphatic and affectionate re-statement of the same, but not merely so;—he evidently alludes to some whom he wishes to warn by his example. Brethren, I (emphatic) do not reckon myself (emphatic) to have laid hold: but one thing (I do: there is nothing expressed in the original: we must not supply

"I reckon," nor "I follow," nor "I think," none of which correspond to the explanation following: nor can we say that nothing requires to be supplied: the sense must have a logical supplement), forgetting the things behind (we, as a runner in the course; by which image, now fully before him, the expressions in this verse must be explained: "For a runner does not think how many times round the course he has completed, but how many remain to be completed: . . . for what profit to us is the past if it be not completed?" Chrysostom), but ever reaching out towards (as the runner whose body is bent forwards in his course. "By reaching out is meant eagerly advancing onward the body even beyond the feet in their course, leaning the whole man forward, and reaching forth the hands, that the speed may be enhanced." Chrysostom) the things before (i. e. the perfection not yet reached), 14.] I pursue towards the goal for (to reach, with a view to; or perhaps simply in the direction of) the prize (see 1 Cor. ix. 24; 2 Tim. iv. 8; Rev. ii. 10) of my heavenly (see Heb. iii. 1; xii. 22: the allusion is to his appointment having been made directly in heaven, not by delegation on earth) calling (not as we familiarly use the word,—"calling in life," &c.—but to be kept to the act of his being called as an Apostle: q. d. 'the prize consequent on the faithful carrying out of that summons which I received from God in heaven') of God (who was the caller: but we must not think of Him, as Grotius and others,—as the arbiter sitting above and summoning to the course,—for in these last words the figure is dropped, and the heavenly calling represents real matter of 15, 16.] Exhortation to them to be unanimous in following this his example. In order to understand this somewhat difficult passage, we must remember (1) that the description of his own views and feelings which he holds up for their imitation (ver. 17) began with having no confidence in the flesh (ver. 3), and has continued to ver. 14. Also (2) that the description commencing with as many as be perfect, is taken up again from ver. 3, "For we are the circumcision, who worship by the Spirit of God, and glory in Christ Jesus," &c. These two considerations will keep us from narrowing too much the exhortation, be thus minded, and from misunderstanding the perfection meant.

15.] As many of us then (refers to ver. 3: see above) as are perfect (mature in Christian life—those described above, ver. 3), let us be of this mind (viz. that described as entertained by himself, vv. 7—14): and if in any thing ye be differently minded (it gives the meaning of diversity in a bad sense. The difference referred to seems to be that of too much self-esteem as to Christian perfection: see below), this also (as well as the rest which he has revealed) will God reveal to you (i. e. in the progress of the Christian life, you will find the true knowledge of your own imperfection and of Christ's all-sufficiency revealed to you by God's Spirit, Eph. i. 17 ff.). even this must not be taken as representing the fact, that ye are otherwise minded, but is the thing, respecting which ye are otherwise minded.

16.] Let not however this diversity, respecting which some of you yet await deeper revelations from God's Spirit, produce any dissension in your Christian unity. Nevertheless (notwithstanding that some of you, &c. as above), as far as we have attained (towards Christian perfection: including both knowledge and practice, of both which he spoke above in his own case), walk by the same (path) (not, 'let us walk', as A. V.).—The exhortation refers to the onward advance of the Christian life—go on together, each one in his place and degree of advance, but all in the same path.

17.] Be imitators together (i. e. with one another: not imitators together with those mentioned below) of me, and observe (for imitation) those who walk in such manner as ye have an example in us.

18.] For (reason for the foregoing command in the form of warning against others who walk differently) many walk (no need to supply any thing, as "wickedly," or "far otherwise:" the word walk stands by itself here, and is defined afterwards), whom I many times mentioned to you (viz. when I was with you), but now mention even weeping ("why weeping? all men in his heart." Chrysostom), the enemies (the article designates the particular class intended) of the cross of Christ (not of the doctrine of the Cross:—nor is there any reason to identify these with those spoken of ver. 2. Not Judaistic but Epicurean error, not obliquity of creed but of practice, is here stigmatized. And so Chrysostom,—“There were some who professed indeed to be Christians, but were living in laxity and self-enjoyment: and this is contrary to the Cross”): 19.] of whom perdition (everlasting, at the coming of the Lord: see ch. i. 28) is the (fixed, certain) end, of whom their belly is the God, and their glory in their shame (their glory is subjective,—that which is glory in the judgment of these men,—and their shame objective,—that which is shame according to the reality of morals), who regard (it is not easy to give the original verb, in this sense, by one word in English. It betokens the whole aspect, the set of the thoughts and desires: “earthly things” are the substratum of all their feelings) the things on earth (in opposition to the things above, compare Col. iii. 1 ff.). 20.] For (I may well direct you to avoid those who regard the things on earth:—for—our state and feelings are wholly alien from theirs) our (emphatic) country (the state to which we belong, of which we by faith are citizens; meaning the Kingdom of God, the heavenly Jerusalem [Gal. iv. 26. Col. iii. 1 ff.]). This objective meaning of the word is better than the subjective one, ‘our citizenship,’ or, ‘our conversation,’ as A. V., which rendering seems to want precedent. Life is worse, even supposing it justifiable, as giving the English reader the idea of eternal life, and so misleading him) subsists (the word is more solemn, as indicating priority and fixedness, than merely is would be: see ch. ii. 6. But in a version, which is to be idiomatic English, the difference cannot well be expressed) in the heavens; from whence also (additional particular, following on heaven being our country) we wait for (expect till the event arrives) a Saviour (emphatic: therefore we cannot “regard the things on earth,” because we are waiting for One to deliver us from them: neither is our end perdition, because One is coming to rescue us from it. Or, as Saviour: but perhaps the other is preferable, as being simpler), (viz.) the Lord Jesus Christ: 21.] (describes the method, in which this Saviour shall save us—a way utterly precluding our making a god of our body) who shall transform (see 1 Cor. xv. 51 ff. The words assume, as St. Paul always does when speaking incidentally, the persons in whose name he is speaking, and among whom he includes himself, surviving to witness the coming of the Lord. The change from the dust of death in the resurrection, however we may accommodate the expression to it, was not originally contemplated by it; witness the looking for Christ, and the body of our humiliation) the body of our humiliation (beware of the rendering “our vile body,” by which most Commentators, and the A. V., here enervate the Apostle’s fine and deep meaning. The body is that object, that material, in which our humiliation has place and is shown, by its suffering and being degraded.—Christ once had such a humiliation, and has passed through it to His glory—and He shall change us so as to be like him.—Whereas the rendering ‘our vile body’ sinks all this, and makes the epithet merely refer to that which is common to all humanity by nature), (so as to be) conformed to the body of His glory (in which, as its object or material, His glory has place and is displayed: again beware of the inadequate rendering “his glorious true ('genuine';—true, as distinguished from counterfeit) yoke-fellow] Who is intended, it is quite impossible to say. Various opinions have been, (1) that St. Paul addresses his own wife. So Clement of Alexandria, saying, "And Paul indeed does not hesitate in a certain Epistle to address his wife as his yoke-fellow, whom he did not lead about with him for the sake of the greater despatch of the ministerial work." But this is evidently an error, and Theodoret says rightly, "This yoke-fellow some have stupidly imagined to be the Apostle's wife, forgetting what he wrote to the Corinthians, numbering himself among the unmarried" (1 Cor. vii. 8). (2) that he was the husband, or brother, of Euodia or Syntyche: so Chrysostom doubtfully, and others. But then the epithet, "yoke-fellow," would hardly be wanted—nor would the expression be at all natural. (3) that he was some fellow-labourer of the Apostle. So Theodoret,—"He calls him yoke-fellow, as bearing the same yoke of the Christian faith:" and others,—and of these some have understood Epaphroditus, others Timothy,—Bengel (but afterwards he preferred Epaphroditus), Silas,—Luther, the chief bishop at Philippi. (4) Others have regarded Synzygus, the Greek word rendered "yoke-fellow," as a proper name. In this case the adjective true would mean, 'who art veritably, as thy name is,' a yoke-fellow. And this might be said by the Apostle, who elsewhere compares the Christian minister to the ox treading out the corn. It seems to me that we must choose between the two last hypotheses. The objections to each are about of equal weight: the Apostle nowhere else calls his fellow-labourers yoke-fellows,—and the proper name Synzigus is nowhere else found. But these are no reasons, respectively, against either hypothesis. We may safely say with Chrysostom, that “whether it be one or the other, it is not a matter to be particular about.” help them] Euodia and Syntyche: but not, as Grotius thinks, in getting their livelihood: it is the work of their reconciliation which he clearly has in view, and in which they would need help. inasmuch as, or seeing that they . . . . The A. V. here is in error, ‘help those women which . . . .’ The Gospel at Philippi was first received by women, Acts xvi. 13 ff., and these two must have been among those who having believed, laboured among their own sex for its spread. with Clement also] These words belong to laboured with me, not to help them, and are rather an additional reminiscence, than a part of the exhortation: ‘as did Clement also &c.,’ as much as to say, ‘not that I mean, by naming those women with distinction, to imply forgetfulness of those others &c., and especially of Clement.—Clement must have been a fellow-worker with the Apostle at Philippi, from the context here; and from the non-occurrence of any such name among Paul’s fellow-travellers, and the fact that his other fellow-labourers must have been Philippians,—himself a native of Philippi. It is perhaps arbitrary, seeing that the name is so common, to assume his identity with Clement afterwards bishop of Rome, and author of the Epistles to the Corinthians. This is done by Eusebius, Origen, and Jerome: but Chrysostom does not notice any such idea. whose names are in the book of life] This description belongs to the others, whom he does not name: whose names are (not a wish, as Bengel, nor are they to be regarded as dead when this was written) in the book of life (see Luke x. 20). An absurd mistake is often made with regard to this verse, and by persons who might know better. It is continually said that Clement is mentioned as having his name written in the book of life: whereas nothing of the kind is here said: but, Euodia and Syntyche and Clement having been specified by name, others are mentioned whom the Apostle does not name, but of whom he beautifully says, that their names are written elsewhere, viz. in the book of life.

4—9.] Exhortation to ALL. 4. AGAIN I will say it] referring to ch. iii. 1, where see note. It is the ground-tone of the Epistle. 5. your moderation] or, your forbearance, reasonableness of dealing, wherein not strictness of legal right, but consideration for one another, is the rule of practice. Aristotle defines it to be that which fills up the necessary deficiencies of law, which is general, by dealing with particular cases as the law-giver would have dealt with them if he had been by. By the prescribing that it is to be known to all men, the Apostle rather intends, ‘let no man know of you any inconsistency with this reasonableness.’ The universality of it justifies its application even to those described above, ch. iii. 18 f.,—that though warned against them, they were to shew all moderation and clemency towards them. Meyer observes well, that the succession of these precepts seems to explain itself psychologically by the disposition of spiritual joy in the Lord exalting us both above rigorism, and above anxiety of mind (ver. 6). The Lord is at hand] These words may apply either to the foregoing—"the Lord will soon come, He is the avenger; it is yours to be moderate and clement;" or to the following—"the Lord is near, be not anxious." Perhaps we may best regard it as the transition from the one to the other: Christ's coming is at hand—this is the best enforcer of clemency and forbearance: it also leads on to the duty of banishing anxiety.

The Lord means Christ, and at hand refers to the day of His coming; see on ch. iii. 20.

Finally resumes again his intention of closing the Epistle with which he had begun ch. iii., but from which he had been diverted by incidental subjects. It is unnatural to attribute to the Apostle so formal a design as De Wette does, of now speaking of man's part, as he had hitherto of God's part:—Chrysostom has it rightly,—"What does 'Finally' mean? It means, I have said all. It denotes one in haste, and having nothing to keep him where he is."—This beautiful sentence, full of the Apostle's fervour and eloquence, derives much force from the frequent repetition of "whatsoever," and then of "if there be any."

But it is fanciful to conclude with Bengel, that it was Spring, when the gift came: see on a similar fancy in 1 Cor. v. 7)—ye budded forth again in caring for my interest (see below). Your care for me was, so to speak, the life of the tree; it existed just as much in winter when there was no vegetation, when ye lacked opportunity, as when the buds were put forth in spring. This is evident by what follows. for which purpose (the purpose namely, of flourishing, putting forth the supply which you have now sent) ye also were anxious (all that long time), but lacked opportunity (Wiesinger well remarks that we must not press this lack of opportunity into a definite hypothesis, such as that their financial state was not adequate—that they had no means of conveyance, &c.—it is perfectly general, and all such fillings up are mere conjecture).

'Self-sufficing' will express its meaning of independence of external help, but is liable to be misunderstood: 'competent' is not in use in this sense, though the abstract noun competence is: the German genüßsam gives it well).

12.] See above. I know (by this teaching) also (this expresses that, besides the general finding of competence in all circumstances, he specially has been taught to suffer humiliation and to bear abundance) how to be brought low (generally: but here especially by need, in humiliation of circumstances. Meyer remarks that 2 Cor. iv. 8; vi. 9, 10, are a commentary on this), I know also (also as before, or as an addition to that clause) how to abound (to be uplifted, as Wiesinger remarks, would be the proper general opposite: but he chooses the special one, which fits the matter of which he is treating): in every thing (not, as A. V., 'every where'; nor 'at every time':—but as usually in St. Paul) and in all things (the expression conveys universality, as 'in each and all,' with us) I have been taught the lesson (initiated: but no stress to be laid, as by Bengel, "I have been taught by secret discipline, unknown to the world:" see the last example below) both to be satiated and to hunger, both to abound and to be in need. 13.] 'After these special notices, he declares his universal power,—how triumphantly, yet how humbly!' Meyer. I can do all things (not 'all these things': 'the Apostle rises no church communicated with me as to (in) an account of giving and receiving (so literally, i.e., every receipt being part of the department of giving and receiving, being one side of such a reckoning, ye alone opened such an account with me. It is true the Philippians had all the giving, the Apostle all the receiving : the debtor side was vacant in their account, the creditor side in his : but this did not make it any the less an account of "giving-and-receiving," categorically so called. This explanation is in my view far the most simple, and preferable to the almost universal one, that his creditor and their debtor side was that which he spiritually imparted to them : for the introduction of spiritual gifts does not belong to the context, and therefore disturbs it), but you only. <sup>16.]</sup> Since even in Thessalonica (which was an early stage of my departing from Macedonia, before the departure was consummated. The since gives a reason for and proof of the former assertion—ye were the only ones, &c.,—and ye began as early as when I was at Thessalonica) ye sent both once and twice (so literally : the account of the expression being, that when the first arrived, they had sent once : when the second, not only once, but twice) to my necessity. <sup>17.]</sup> Again he removes any chance of misunderstanding, as above in ver. 11. On the expression, see Eph. v. 2, note), a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God (see Heb. xiii. 16 ; 1 Pet. ii. 5).

20.] The contemplation both of the Christian reward, of which he has been speaking, and of the glorious completion of all God's dealings at the great day,—and the close of his Epistle,—suggests this ascription of praise.

But—however rich you may be in good works, however strong I may be by Christ to bear all things,—not to us, but to our God and Father be the glory. On the expression rendered for ever and ever, see note, Eph. iii. 21.

in Christ Jesus] belongs more probably to salute,—see Rom. xvi. 22; 1 Cor. xvi. 19,—than to "saint," as in ch. i. 1, where, as Meyer observes, the expression has a diplomatic formality, whereas here there is no reason for so formal an adjunct.

The brethren which are with me] These must, on account of the next verse, have been his closer friends, perhaps his colleagues in the ministry, such as Aristarchus, Epaphras, Demas, Timotheus. But there has arisen a question, how to reconcile this with ch. ii. 20? And it may be answered, that the lack of oneness of mind there predicated of his companions, did not exclude them from the title "brethren," nor from sending greeting to the Philippians: see also ch. i. 14.

22. All the saints] i.e., all the Christians here. they that are of Cæsar's household] These perhaps were slaves belonging to the (technically so called) familia (i.e. all attached to the palace, including slaves and every dependant) of Nero, who had been converted by intercourse with St. Paul, probably at this time a prisoner in the prætorian barracks (see ch. i. 13, note) attached to the palace. This is much more likely, than that any of the actual family of Nero should have embraced Christianity. The reason of these being specified is not plain: the connexion perhaps between a colony, and some of the imperial household, might account for it.

This love of the Colossians he lays stress on, as a ground for thankfulness, a fruit of the hope laid up for them,—as being that side of their Christian character where he had no fault [or least fault, see ch. iii. 12—14] to find with them. from) the might of His glory (beware of the rendering 'his glorious power,' into which A. V. has fallen here: the attribute of His glorious majesty here brought out is its might [see Eph. i. 19, note], the power which it has thus to strengthen. In the very similar expression Eph. iii. 16, it was the "riches of His glory," the exuberant abundance of the same, from which, as an inexhaustible treasure, our strength is to come), to (so as to produce in you, so that ye may attain to) all patient endurance (not only in tribulations, but generally in the life of the Spirit. Endurance is the result of the union of outward and inward strength) and long-suffering (not only towards your enemies or persecutors, but also in the conflict with error, which is more in question in this Epistle) with joy (some join these words with the next verse: but besides other objections, we thus lose the essential idea of joyful endurance,—and the beautiful train of thought, that joyfulness in suffering expresses itself in thankfulness to God);

12.] giving thanks to the Father (the connexion is not, as Chrysostom and others, with "we do not cease," in ver. 9, the subject being we, Paul and Timothy,—but with the last words [see above], and the subjects are 'you.' The Father, viz. of our Lord Jesus Christ), which made (historical—by His gift of the Spirit through His Son: not "hath made," as A. V.) us (Christians) meet (or, capable) for the share (participation) of the inheritance of the saints in [the] light (it is much disputed with what in [the] light is to be joined. Meyer, after Chrysostom and others, regards it as instrumental—as the means of the making meet which has been mentioned. But this seems unnatural, both in sense, and in the position of the words, in which it stands too far from "made us meet" to be its qualifying clause. It connects much more naturally with the word "inheritance," or perhaps better still with the whole, "the portion of the inheritance of the saints," giving "the light" as the region in which the inheritance of the saints, and consequently our share in it, is situated. Some would take "the saints in (the) light" together: but it does not seem so natural, as giving too great prominence to "those who shall gain" the inheritance, and not enough to the inheritance itself. The question as to whether he is speaking of a present inheritance, or the future glory of heaven, seems best answered by Chrysostom, who says, "He seems to me to be speaking at the same time of things present and things to come." The inheritance is begun here, and the meetness conferred, in gradual sanctification: but completed hereafter. We are "in the light" here: see Rom. xiii. 12, 13; 1 Thess. v. 5; Eph. v. 8; 1 Pet. ii. 9 al.):

The Commentators compare Benoni, 'the son of my sorrow,' Gen. xxxv. 18. Beware of missing all the force by rendering "his dear Son," as A. V.).

There we have “trespasses,” the more special word: but here sins, the more general: the meaning being the same): 15.] (the last verse has been a sort of introduction, through our own part in Him, to the Person of the Redeemer, which is now directly treated of, as against the teachers of error at Colossæ. He is described, in His relation 1) to God and His Creation [vv. 15—17]: 2) to the Church [18—20]) who is (now—in His glorified state—essentially and permanently: therefore not to be understood of the historical Christ, God manifested in our flesh on earth: nor again of the eternal Word: but of Christ’s present glorified state, in which He is exalted in our humanity, but exalted to that glory which He had with the Father before the world was. So that the following description applies to Christ’s whole Person in its essential glory,—now however, by His assumption of humanity, necessarily otherwise conditioned than before that assumption. See for the whole, notes on Phil. ii. 6, and Heb. i. 2 f.) the image of the invisible God (the adjunct invisible is of the utmost weight to the understanding of the expression. The same fact being the foundation of the whole as in Phil. ii. 6 ff., that the Son subsisted in the form of God, that side of the fact is brought out here, which points to His being the visible manifestation of that in God which is invisible: the word of the eternal silence, the shining forth of the glory which no creature can bear, the expressed mark of that Person which is incommunicably God’s; in one word, the declarer of the Father, whom none hath seen. So that while the epithet invisible includes in it not only the invisibility, but the incommunicability of God, the term image also must not be restricted to Christ corporeally visible in the Incarnation, but understood of Him as the manifestation of God in His whole Person and work—præ-existent and incarnate. It is obvious, that in this expression, the Apostle approaches very near to the Alexandrian doctrine of the Logos or Word: how near, may be seen by an extract from Philo: “As they who cannot look upon the sun, behold the sunshine opposite to him as himself, and the changing phases of the moon as being himself: so men apprehend the image of God, His Angel the Word, as being Himself.” St. Paul is, in fact, as St. John afterwards did, adopting the language of that lore as far as it represented divine truth, and rescuing it from being used in the service of error), the first-born of all creation (such, and not ‘every creature,’ is the meaning. See the reason for maintaining this in my Greek Test.—Christ is THE FIRST-BORN, Heb. i. 6. The idea was well known in the Alexandrian doctrine, and found in the writings of Philo. That the word is used as one whose meaning and reference was already known to the readers, is shewn by its being predicated of Christ as compared with two classes so different, the creatures, and the dead (ver. 18).—The first and simplest meaning is that of priority of birth. But this, if insisted on, in its limited temporal sense, must apply to our Lord’s birth from his human mother, and could have reference only to those brothers and sisters who were born of her afterwards; a reference clearly excluded here. But a secondary and derived meaning of “first-born,” as a designation of dignity and precedence, implied by priority, cannot be denied. See Ps. lxxxix. 27, “I will make him my first-born, higher than the kings of the earth.” Exod. iv. 22; Rom. viii. 29, and Heb. xii. 23. It would be obviously wrong here to limit the sense entirely to this reference, as the very expression below, “He is before all things,” shews, in which His priority is distinctly predicated. The safe method of interpretation therefore will be, to take into account the two ideas manifestly included in the word, and here distinctly referred to—priority, and dignity, and to regard the technical term “first-born” as used rather with reference to both these, than in strict construction where it stands. "First-born of every creature" will then imply, that Christ was not only first-born of His mother in the world, but first-begotten of His Father, before the worlds,—and that He holds the rank, as compared with every created thing, of first-born in dignity: BECAUSE, &c., ver. 16, where this assertion is justified. V.—this is expressed afterwards, and is a different fact from the present one, though implied in it) were all things created (was created the universe would better give the force of the Greek singular with the collective neuter plural, which it is important here to preserve, as 'all things' may be thought of individually, not collectively—viz.), things in the heavens and things on the earth (an inexact designation of heaven and earth, and all that in them is, Rev. x. 6), things visible and things invisible, whether (these latter be) thrones, whether lordships, whether governments, whether authorities (these or nearly these distinctive classes of the heavenly powers occur in a more general sense in Eph. i. 21, where see note. It would be vain to attempt to assign to each of these their places in the celestial world. Perhaps the Apostle chose the expressions as terms common to the doctrine of the Colossian false teachers and his own). The occurrence of so very similar a catalogue in Eph. i. 21, where no such object could be in view, hardly looks as if such a design were before him. Meyer well remarks, "For Christian faith it remains fixed, and it is sufficient, that there is testimony borne to the existence of different degrees and categories in the world of spirits above; but all attempts more precisely to fix these degrees, beyond what is written in the New Test., belong to the fanciful domain of theosophy"): the whole universe (see above on all things, ver. 16) has been created (not now of the mere act, but of the resulting endurance of creation—leading on to the "subsisting" below) by Him (instrumental: He is the agent in creation—the act was His, and the upholding is His: see John i. 3, note) and for Him (with a view to Him: He is the end of creation, containing the reason in Himself why creation is at all, and why it is as it is. See my Sermons on Divine Love, Sermon i. ii.): <sup>17.]</sup> and He Himself (emphatic, His own person) is (as in John viii. 58, of essential existence: "was" might have been used, as in John i. 1: but as Meyer well observes, the Apostle keeps the past tenses for the explanatory clauses referring to past facts, vv. 16, 19) before (in time; bringing out one side of the primo-genitive above: not in rank, as the Socinians), all things, and in Him (as its conditional element of existence, see above on "in him," ver. 16) the universe subsists ('keeps together,' 'is held together in its present state': "Not only did He call it out of nothing into being, but He also holds it together now." Chrysostom).

that He is:’ the relative has an argumentative force) is the beginning (of the Church of the First-born, being Himself first-born from the dead. Compare “Christ the firstfruits,” 1 Cor. xv. 23, and especially Gen. xlix. 3; Deut. xxi. 17; Rev. iii. 14. But the word evidently has, standing as it does here alone, a wider and more glorious reference than that of mere temporal precedence: see note on Rev. iii. 14: He is the Beginning, in that in Him is begun and conditioned the Church, vv. 19, 20), the First-born from (among) the dead (i. e. the first who arose from among the dead: but the term first-born [see above] being predicated of Christ in both references, he uses it here, regarding the resurrection as a kind of birth. We must bear in mind here, with Meyer, that the meaning is not active, that which fills any thing, but passive, that with which any thing is filled: all that fulness of grace which is the complement of the divine character, and which dwells permanently in Christ. The various other interpretations see in my Greek Test.) should dwell (“this indwelling is the foundation of the reconciliation,” Bengel); 20.] through Him (as the instrument, in Redemption as in Creation, see above ver. 16 end) to reconcile again (see note on Eph. ii. 16) all things (the universe: not to be limited to ‘all intelligent beings,’ or ‘all men,’ or ‘the whole Church’: these all things are broken up below into terms which will admit of no such limitation. On the fact, see below) to Him (viz. to Himself, i. e. to God, Eph. ii. 16: the writer has in his mind two Persons, both expressed by He and Him, and to be understood from the context); having made peace (the subject is not Christ [as in Eph. i. 15], but the Father: He is the subject in the whole sentence since the beginning of ver. 19) by means of the blood of (genitive possessive, belonging to, figuratively, as being shed on) His cross,—through Him (emphatic repetition, to bring HIM, the Person of Christ, into its place of prominence again, after the interruption occasioned by the last clause),—whether (all things consist of) the things on the earth, or the things in the heavens.—It has been a question, in what sense this reconciliation is predicated of the whole universe. Short of this meaning we cannot stop: we cannot hold with Erasmus and others, that it is a reconciliation of the various portions of creation to one another: nor, for the same reason, with Schleiermacher, understand that the elements to be reconciled are the Jews and Gentiles, who were at variance about earthly and heavenly things, and were to be set at one in reference to God. The Apostle's meaning clearly is, that by the blood of Christ's Cross, reconciliation with God has passed on all creation as a whole, including angelic as well as human beings, unreasoning and lifeless things, as well as organized and intelligent. Now this may be understood in the following ways: 1) creation may be strictly regarded in its entirety, and man's offence viewed as having, by inducing impurity upon one portion of it, alienated the whole from God: and thus "all things" may be involved in our fall. Some support may seem to be derived for this by the undeniable fact, that the whole of man's world is included in these consequences (see Rom. viii. 19 f.). But on the other side, we never find the angelic beings thus involved: nay, we are taught to regard them as our model in hallowing God's name, realizing His kingdom, and doing His will (Matt. vi. 9, 10). And again the terms here used, "whether . . . whether . . ." would not suffer this: reconciliation is thus predicated of each portion separately. We are thus driven, there being no question about the things on the earth, to enquire, how the things in the heavens can be said to be reconciled by the blood of the Cross. And here again, 2) we may say that angelic, celestial creation was alienated from God because a portion of it fell from its purity: and, though there is no idea of the reconciliation extending to that portion, yet the whole, as a whole, may need thus reconciling, by the final driving into punishment of the fallen, and thus setting the faithful in perfect and undoubted unity with God. But to this I answer, a) that such reconciliation (?) though it might be a result of the coming of the Lord Jesus, yet could not in any way be effected by the blood of His cross: b) that we have no reason to think that the fall of some angels involved the rest in its consequences, or that angelic being is evolved from any root, as ours is from Adam: nay, in both these particulars, the very contrary is revealed. We must then seek our solution in some meaning which will apply to angelic beings in their essential nature, not as regards the sin of some among them. And as thus applied, no reconciliation must be thought of which shall resemble ours in its process—for Christ took not upon Him the seed of angels, nor paid any propitiatory penalty in the root of their nature, as including it in Himself. But, forasmuch as He is their Head as well as ours,—forasmuch as in Him they, as well as ourselves, live and move and have their being, it cannot be but that the great event in which He was glorified through suffering, should also bring them nearer to God, who subsist in Him in common with all creation. And at some such increase of blessedness does our Apostle seem to hint in Eph. iii. 10. That such increase might be described as a reconciliation, is manifest. In fact, every such nearer approach to Him may without violence to words be so described, in comparison with that previous greater distance which now seems like alienation;—and in this case even more properly, as one of the consequences of that great propitiation whose first and plainest effect was to reconcile to God, in the literal sense, the things upon earth, polluted and hostile in consequence of man's sin. So that our interpretation may be thus summed up: All creation subsists in Christ: all creation therefore is affected by His act of propitiation: sinful creation is, in the strictest sense, reconciled, from being at enmity: sinless creation, ever at a distance from his unapproachable purity, is lifted into nearer participation and higher glorification of Him, and is thus reconciled, though not in the strictest, yet in a very intelligible and allowable sense.

21, 22.] And you, who were once alienated (subjective or objective? — 'estranged' [in mind], or 'banished' [in fact]?) In Eph. ii. 12, it is decidedly objective, for such is the cast of the whole sentence there: in Eph. iv. 18 it describes the objective result, with regard to the life of God, of the subjective 'being darkened in the understanding.' It is better then here to follow usage, and interpret objectively—'alienated'—made aliens) from God (not from the commonwealth of Israel, nor from the life of God: for 'God' is the subject of the sentence), and at enmity (active or passive? 'hating God,' or 'hated by God?') Meyer takes the latter, as necessary in Rom. v. 10 [see

But here, where the mind and wicked works are mentioned, there exists no such necessity: the objective state of enmity is grounded in its subjective causes;—and the intelligent responsible being is contemplated in the whole sentence: see the appeal, “provided that ye abide,” &c., below. I take enmity therefore actively, ‘hostile to Him’) in (specifies the part in which) your understanding (intellectual part: see on Eph. ii. 3, iv. 18) in your wicked works (sphere and element in which you lived, applying to both the alienation and the enmity), now however hath He (i. e. God, as before) reconciled in (of the situation or element of the reconciliation, so ver. 24, “in my flesh,” and 1 Pet. ii. 24) the body of his (Christ’s) flesh (why so particularized? Bengel says, “to distinguish from the Church which is called the body of Christ:”—but this is irrelevant here: no one could have imagined that to be the meaning:—and other irrelevant reasons are given. But the true one is doubtless this, which Meyer suggests: ‘He found occasion enough to write of the reconciliation as he does here and ver. 20, in the angel-following of his readers, in which they ascribed reconciling mediatorship with God partly to higher spiritual beings, who were without a body of flesh’) through His Death (that being the instrumental cause, without which the reconciliation would not have been effected), to (aim and end) present you (see Eph. v. 27 and note: not, as a sacrifice) holy and unblameable and irreproachable (holy represents the positive, blameless and unreproachable the negative side of holiness. The question whether inherent or imputed sanctity is here meant, is best answered by remembering the whole analogy of St. Paul’s teaching, in which it is clear that progressive sanctification is ever the end, as regards the Christian, of his justification by faith. Irrespective even of the strong testimony of the next verse, I should uphold here the reference to inherent holiness, the work of the Spirit, consequent indeed on entering into the righteousness of Christ by faith. “It is,” says Calvin, “a passage worthy of observation, testifying that no gratuitous righteousness is conferred upon us in Christ, but that we must be born again by the Spirit to the obedience of righteousness: as he elsewhere teaches (1 Cor. i. 30), that Christ is made unto us righteousness”) before His (own) presence (at the day of Christ’s appearing): <sup>23</sup>] (condition of this presentation being realized: put in the form of an assumption of their firmness in the hope and faith of the Gospel)—if, that is (i. e. ‘provided, or assuming that,’ see note on 2 Cor. v. 3), ye persist in the faith grounded (see Eph. iii. 18, note: and on the sense, Luke vi. 48, 49) and steadfast (1 Cor. xv. 58, where the thought also of immoveability occurs), and not being moved away from the hope of (belonging to, see Eph. i. 18: the sense “wrought by the Gospel” is true in fact, but hardly expresses the construction) the Gospel which ye heard (not, have heard). “Three considerations enforcing the not being moved away:—it would be for the Colossians themselves inexcusable, inconsistent with the universality of the Gospel, and contrary to the personal relation of the Apostle to the Gospel.” Meyer),—which was preached (“he saith not, is being preached, but speaks of it as already believed on and preached.” Chrysostom) in all creation (see Mark xvi. 15. note) which is under the heaven,—of which I Paul became a minister (as Chrysostom remarks, “This enhances his dignity and trustworthiness, as being put in charge with this Gospel thus widely spread, and so constituted the teacher of the world”).

24.] Transition from the mention of himself to his joy in his sufferings for the Church, and (25—29) for the great object of his ministry:—all with a view to enhance the glory, and establish the paramount claim of Christ.—I now (refers to what he beforetime became—extending what he is about to say down to the present time—emphatic, of time, not transitional merely) rejoice in (as the state in which I am when I rejoice, and the element of my joy itself. Our own idiom recognizes the same compound reference) my sufferings on your behalf (not, ‘as a substitute for you;’ but strictly ‘for your advantage,’ that you may be confirmed in the faith by [not my example merely], but the glorification of Christ in my sufferings), and am filling up the deficiencies (plural, because the afflictions are thought of individually, not as a mass: those sufferings which are wanting) of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh (these words, ‘in my flesh,’ belong to the verb am filling up, not to ‘the afflictions of Christ:’ for if it were so, the clause, ‘the afflictions of Christ in my body,’ would contain in itself that which the whole clause asserts, and thus make it flat and tautological) on behalf of His body, which is the Church (the meaning being this: all the tribulations of Christ’s body are Christ’s tribulations. Whatever the whole Church has to suffer, even to the end, she suffers for her perfection in holiness and her completion in Him: and the tribulations of Christ will not be complete till the last pang shall have passed, and the last tear have been shed. Every suffering saint of God in every age and position is in fact filling up, in his place and degree, the afflictions of Christ, in his flesh, and on behalf of His body. Not a pang, not a tear is in vain. The Apostle, as standing out prominent among this suffering body, predicates this of himself especially: the filling up, to which we all contribute, was on his part so considerable, as to deserve the name of a compensation itself, for so the remarkable word implies, which we render fill up—I am contributing afflictions which one after another fill up the defects. Notice that of the SUFFERINGS of Christ not a word is said [see however 2 Cor. i. 5]: the context does not concern, nor does the word afflictions express, those meritorious sufferings which He bore in His person once for all, the measure of which was for ever filled by the one sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction, on the cross; He is here regarded as suffering with His suffering people, bearing them in Himself, and being as in Isa. lxiii. 9, “afflicted in all their affliction.” On other suggested interpretations, see in my Greek Test.):

25.] of which (in service of which, on behalf of which) I (emphatic, resuming “I Paul” above) became a minister, according to (so that my ministry is conducted in pursuance of, after the requirements and conditions of) the stewardship (see on 1 Cor. ix. 17; iv. 1, al.: also Eph. i. 10; iii. 2: not, ‘dispensation:’ the simpler meaning here seems best, especially when taken with the word given. “In the house of God, which is the Church, I am steward, as it were dispensing to the whole family, i. e. to individual Christians, the goods and the gifts of God my Lord.” Cornelius a Lapide) of God (of which God is the source and chief) which was given (entrusted) me towards (so literally: i. e., with a view to or for) you (among other Gentiles; but as so often, the particular reference of the occasion is brought out, and the general kept back), to (object and aim of the giving of the stewardship) fulfil the word of God (exactly as in Rom. xv. 19, to fulfil the duty of the stewardship towards you, in doing all that this preaching of the word requires);

26.] (namely) the mystery (see on Eph. i. 9) which hath been hidden from (the time of; the preposition is temporal, not 'from' in the sense of 'hidden from') the ages and the generations (before us, or of the world: the expression is historical, and within the limits of our world), but now (in these times) was manifested (so in the original: but in English in connexion with now, we must say, hath been). The expression is historical: it was manifested at the glorification of Christ and the bestowal of the Spirit) unto His saints (all believers, not merely as in Eph. iii. 5, where the reference is different, the Apostles and prophets [see there], as some of the Commentators have explained it):

27.] to whom (equivalent to, "seeing that to them:" this verse setting forth, not the contents of the mystery before mentioned, but a separate particular, that these saints are persons to whom God, &c.) God willed to make known what (how full, how inexhaustible) is the richness of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles (is this the [subjective] glory of the elevated human character, brought in by the Gospel: or is it the glory of God, manifested [objective] by His grace in this mystery, revealing His Person to the Gentiles? Neither of these seems to satisfy the conditions of the sentence, in which the glory reappears below with the hope prefixed. On this account, we must understand it of the glory of which the Gentiles are to become partakers by the revelation of this mystery: i.e. the glory which is begun here, and completed at the Lord's coming, see Rom. viii. 17, 18. And it is the glory of, belonging to, this mystery, because the mystery contains and reveals it as a portion of its contents. The richness of this glory is unfolded and made known by God's Spirit as the Gospel is received among the Gentiles, as the most wonderful display of it: the Gentiles having been sunk so low in moral and spiritual degradation); which (mystery: this is more in analogy with St. Paul's own method of speaking than to understand which of the riches. Besides which [this mystery] [among the Gentiles] is strictly parallel with, being explained by [Christ] [among you] is (consists in) Christ (Himself: not to be weakened away into the knowledge of Christ,—or the doctrine of Christ: compare Gal. ii. 20; Eph. iii. 17; 1 Tim. iii. 16) among you (not to be confined to the rendering, 'in you,' individually, though this is the way in which Christ is among you: among you here is strictly parallel with among the Gentiles above: before the Gospel came they were "separate from Christ," Eph. ii. 12), the HOPE (emphatic; explains how Christ among them was to acquaint them what is the riches, &c., viz. by being Himself the HOPE of that glory) of the glory (not abstract, 'of glory': it is, the glory which has just been mentioned):

28.] whom (Christ) we (myself and Timothy: but generally, of all who were associated with him in this true preaching: not, 'I,' which here quite destroys the force. We preach Christ—not circumcision, not angel-worship, not asceticism, as the source of this hope) proclaim (as being this hope of the glory), warning (see on Eph. vi. 4, and below) every man, and teaching every man (I am inclined with Meyer to take warning and teaching as corresponding in the main to the two great subjects of Christian preaching, repentance and faith) in all wisdom (these words represent the method of this teaching); that we may present (see above ver. 22) every man (notice the emphatic triple repetition of every man, shewing that the Apostle was jealous of every the least invasion, on the part of the false teachers, of those souls with whom he was put in charge. At the same time it carries a solemn individual appeal to those thus warned and taught) perfect in Christ (element of his perfection, in union with and life in Him,—comprehending both knowledge and practice. The presentation spoken of is clearly that at the great day of Christ's appearing):

29.] His own personal part in this general work—for which end (viz. the presenting, &c.) I labour also (also implies the addition of a new particular over and above the proclaiming, carrying it onwards even to this), earnestly contending (in spirit; in the earnestness with which he strove for this end, see ch. ii. 1—3: not, with adversaries: this was so, but is not relevant here. See Phil. i. 30; 1 Thess. ii. 2) according to (after the proportion of, as is to be expected from) His (Christ's—see Phil. iv. 13: not God's) working, which worketh in me mightily (there is no allusion to miraculous gifts, as some have thought).

CHAP. II.] FIRST PART OF THE EPISTLE. His earnestness in entering into and forwarding the Christian life among them, so amply set forth in ch. i., is now more pointedly directed to warning them against false teachers. This he does by 1) connecting his conflict, just spoken of, with the confirmation in spiritual knowledge of themselves and others whom he had not seen (vv. 1—3): 2) warning them against false wisdom which might lead them away from Christ (vv. 4—23): and that a) generally and in hints (vv. 4—15),—b) specifically and plain-spokenly (vv. 16—23).

1.] For (follows on, and justifies, while it exemplifies the contention just spoken of, ch. i. 29) I would have you know how great (emphatic: not only that I have a contention, but how great it is) a conflict (of anxiety and prayer, ch. iv. 12: his present imprisoned state necessitates this reference here: he could not be in conflict with the false teachers) I have on behalf of you, and those at Laodicea (who probably were in the same danger of being led astray, see ch. iv. 16: on Laodicea, see Introd. to Apocalypse, § iii. 13), and (for) as many as have not seen my face in the flesh (the tendency of this verse is, to exalt the importance of the Apostle's bodily presence with a church, if its defect caused him such anxiety, so that we must not say, with some, that he shews them how little his bodily presence mattered compared with his presence in the spirit which they always had),

2.] that (object of the contention) their hearts may be confirmed (it can hardly be doubted here, where he is treating, not of troubles and persecutions, but of being shaken from the faith, that the word, so manifold in its bearings, and so difficult to express in English, carries with it the meaning of strengthening, not of comforting merely. If we could preserve in 'comfort' the trace of its derivation from the Latin 'confortari,' it might answer here: but in our present usage, it does not convey any idea of strengthening), they being

Love is thus the element of the being knit together), and (besides the elementary unity) unto (as the object of the knitting together), all the riches of the full assurance of the (Christian) understanding (the accumulated substantives shew us generally the Apostle's anxious desire for a special reason to impress the importance of the matter on them. "I know," he says, "that you believe, but I wish you to be completed, not only unto the riches, but to all the riches, that ye may be complete in all things and fully." Chrysostom), unto (parallel with the former, and explaining all the riches, &c., by the thorough knowledge, &c.) the thorough knowledge (on thorough knowledge and knowledge, here clearly distinguished, see on ch. i. 9) of the mystery of God (the additions here found in the received text, and in other authorities, seem to be owing to the common practice in the MSS., of annotating in the margin on the divine name, to specify to which Person it belongs. Thus it would seem likely that, of God having been all that was in the original, "the Father" was placed against it by some, "Christ" or "the Christ" by others: and then these found their way into the text in various combinations, some of which from their difficulty gave rise again to alterations. The reading in the text, as accounting for all the rest, has been adopted by Griesbach, Scholz, Tischendorf, Olshausen, De Wette, and others): in which The objection to this is, that it is contrary to fact: the treasures are not hidden, but revealed. The rendering which I have adopted is that of Meyer, and I am persuaded on consideration that it is not only the only logical but the only grammatical one also. The expression here used occurs only this once. It is necessary, in order to express its full sense, to give something of a predicative force both to "the Christ" and to "the Lord:": see 1 Cor. xii. 3. On the sense, Bispington says well: "Notice that Paul here says, 'ye received the Christ,' and not 'ye received the word of Christ.' True faith is a spiritual communion: for in faith we receive not only the doctrine of Christ, but Himself, into us: in faith He Himself dwells in us: we cannot separate Christ, as Eternal Truth, and His doctrine"), in Him walk (carry on your life of faith and practice);

See Eph. ii. 20, where this latter is set forth as a fact in the past), and confirmed in the (or, your) faith as ye were taught, abounding therein in (or, with) thanksgiving (the field of operation, or element, in which that abundance is manifested).

The character of the philosophy here meant, as gathered from the descriptions which follow, was that mixture of Jewish and Oriental, which afterwards expanded into gnosticism), according to the tradition of men (this tradition, derived from men, human and not divine in its character, set the rule to this his philosophy, and according to this he captivated men), according to the elements (see on Gal. iv. 3: the rudimentary lessons: i. e. the ritualistic observances in which they were becoming entangled) of the world (all these belonged to the earthly side—were the carnal and imperfect phase of knowledge—now the perfect was come, the imperfect was done

9.] (Supply, 'as all true philosophy ought to be') Because in Him (emphatic: in Him alone) dwelleth (now, in His exaltation) all the fulness (compare on i. 19, and see below) of the Godhead (Deity: the essential being of God. 'The fulness of the Godhead' here spoken of must be taken, as indeed the context shews, metaphysically, and not as 'all fulness' in ch. i. 19, where the historical Christ, as manifested in redemption, was in question. There, the lower side, so to speak, of that fulness, was set forth—the side which is presented to us here, is the higher side) bodily (i. e., manifested corporeally, in His present glorified Body—compare Phil. iii. 21. 'are circumcised,'—the reference being to the historical fact of their baptism) with a circumcision not wrought by hands (see Eph. ii. 11, and Rom. ii. 29. The same reference to spiritual [ethical] circumcision is found in Dent. x. 16; xxx. 6; Ezek. xlv. 7; Acts vii. 51), in (consisting in—which found its realization in) your putting off (i. e. when you threw off: put off and laid aside, as a garment: an allusion to actual circumcision,—see below) of the body of the flesh (i. e. as ch. i. 22, the body of which the material was flesh: but more here: so also its designating attribute, its leading principle was fleshliness—the domination of the flesh which is a "flesh of sin," Rom. viii. 3. This body is put off in baptism, the sign and seal of the new life. "When ethically circumcised, i. e. translated by change of heart out of the state of sin into that of the Christian life of faith, we have no more the body of the flesh: for the body, which we bear, is disarrayed of its sinful flesh as such, as far as regards its sinful quality: we are no more in the flesh as before, when lusted wrought in our members [Rom. vii. 5, see ver. 23]; we are no more 'carnal, sold under sin' [Rom. vii. 14], and walk no more according to the flesh, but in newness of spirit [Rom. vii. 6], so that our members are instruments of righteousness unto God [Rom. vi. 13]. This Christian transformation is set forth in its ideal conception, irrespective of its imperfect realization in our experience." Meyer) in (parallel to "in" before—then the circumcision without hands was explained, now it is again adduced with another epithet bringing it nearer home to them) the circumcision of Christ (belonging to, brought about by union with, Christ:

nearly the same as, but expresses more than 'Christian circumcision,' inasmuch as it shews that the root and cause of this circumcision without hands is in Christ, the union with whom is immediately set forth. Two other interpretations are given: 1) that in which Christ is regarded as the circumciser: so Theophylact says, "Christ circumcises in baptism, stripping off from us our former life." 2) that in which Christ is the circumcised—"the circumcision to which Christ submitted Himself for man." The objection to both is, that they introduce irrelevant elements into the context. The circumcision which Christ works would not naturally be followed by "having been buried with Him," i. e., union with Him: that which was wrought on Him might be thus followed, but would not come in naturally in a passage which describes, not the universal efficacy of the rite once for all performed on Him, but the actual undergoing of it in a spiritual sense, by each one of us):

12.] (goes on to connect this still more closely with the person of Christ,—as if it had been said, 'in the circumcision of Christ, to whom you were united,' &c.)—having been buried together (i. e. 'when you were buried') with Him in your baptism (the new life being begun at baptism,—an image familiar alike to Jews and Christians,—the process itself of baptism is regarded as the burial of the former life: originally, perhaps, owing to the practice of immersion, which would most naturally give rise to the idea: but to maintain from such a circumstance that immersion is necessary in baptism, is surely the merest trifling, and a resuscitation of the very ceremonial spirit which the Apostle here is arguing against. As reasonably might it be argued, from the metaphor of "putting off" being used here, that nakedness was an essential in that sacrament. The things represented by both figures belong to the essentials of the Christian life: the minor details of the sacrament which corresponded to them, may in different ages or climates be varied; but the spiritual figures remain. At the same time, if circumstances concurred,—e. g. a climate where the former practice was always safe, and a part of the world, or time of life, where the latter would be no shock to decency,—there can be no question that the external proprieties of baptism ought to be complied with. And on this principle the baptismal services of the Church of England are constructed); wherein (i. e. in baptism: not, as most expositors, 'in whom,' i. e. Christ) ye were also raised again with Him (not your material, but your spiritual resurrection is in the foreground: it is bound on, it is true, to His material resurrection, and brings with it in the background, yours: but in the spiritual, the material is included and taken for granted, as usual in Scripture) through (by means of: the mediate, not the efficient cause; the hand which held on, not the plank that saved) your (or, the) faith in the operation of God (in Christ—that mighty power by which the Father raised Him, compare Rom. viii. 11; Eph. i. 20), who raised Him from the dead ("for believing in the power of God we wait for the resurrection, having as a pledge of it the resurrection of Christ our Lord." Theodoret. But there is very much more asserted than the mere waiting for the resurrection—the power of God in raising the dead to life is one and the same in our Lord and in us—the physical power exerted in Him is not only a pledge of the same physical power to be exerted in us, but a condition and assurance of a spiritual power already exerted in us, whereby we are in spirit risen with Christ, the physical resurrection being included and taken for granted in that other and greater one).

13—15.] Application, first to the (Gentile) Colossians, then to all believers, of the whole blessedness of this participation in Christ's resurrection, and assertion of the superseding of the law, and subjection of all secondary powers to Christ.

13.] And you, being (more strictly, when you were) dead (allusion to the words immediately preceding) in your trespasses (see Eph. ii. 1,

The question as to the reference, whether to spiritual or physical resurrection, is answered by remembering that the former includes the latter), having forgiven (this is not contemporaneous with the quickening, but antecedent: this forgiveness was an act of God wrought once for all in Christ. See 2 Cor. v. 19; Eph. iv. 32) us (he here passes from the particular to the general—from the Colossian Gentiles to all believers) all our transgressions; <sup>14</sup>] blotting out (or having blotted, or wiped out, contemporary with having forgiven—in fact the same act explained in its conditions and details) the handwriting in decrees (compare the similar expression Eph. ii. 15, and notes. The handwriting represents the whole law, the obligatory bond which was against us [see below], and is apparently used because the Decalogue, representing that law, was written on tables of stone with the finger of God. Respecting the various interpretations of it, see my Greek Test.) which was hostile to us (the repetition of the sentiment already contained in the words “that was against us” seems to be made by way of stronger emphasis, as against the false teachers, reasserting and invigorating the fact that the law was no help, but a hindrance to us), and (not only so, but) hath taken it (the handwriting itself, thus obliterated) away (i. e. ‘from out of the way’), [by] nailing it to the cross (“since by the death of Christ on the cross the condemnatory law lost its hold on us, inasmuch as Christ by this death bore the curse of the law for mankind [Gal. iii. 13],—in the fact of Christ being nailed to the Cross the Law was nailed thereon, in so far as, by Christ’s crucifixion, it lost its obligatory power and ceased to be in our way.” Meyer).

<sup>15</sup>] The utmost care must be taken to interpret this verse according to the requirements of grammar and of the context. The first seems to me to necessitate the rendering, not, as the great majority of Commentators, ‘having spoiled,’ a meaning unexampled, and precluded by the plain usage, by the Apostle himself, a few verses below, ch. iii. 9, of the same word,—but ‘having stripped off,’ ‘divested himself of.’ Then the second must guide us to the meaning of the principalities and the powers. Most Commentators have at once assumed these to be the infernal powers, or evil angels: relying on Eph. vi. 12, where undoubtedly such is the specific reference of these general terms. But the terms being general, such specific reference must be determined by the context of each passage,—or, indeed, there may be no such specific reference at all, but they may be used in their fullest general sense. Now the words have occurred before in this very passage, ver. 10, where Christ is exalted as the head of all principality and power: and it is hardly possible to avoid connecting our present expression with that, seeing that in “the principalities and the powers,” the articles seem to contain a manifest reference to it. Now, what is the context? Is it in any way relevant to the fact of the law being superseded by God in the great Sacrifice of the atonement, to say that He, in that act (or, according to others, Christ in that act), spoiled and triumphed over the infernal potentates? Or would the following “therefore” deduce any legitimate inference from such a fact? But, suppose the matter to stand in this way.

The law was “ministered by angels” (Gal. iii. 19: see Acts vii. 53), “the word spoken by angels” (Heb. ii. 2:—they were the promulgators of the “handwriting in ordinances.” In that promulgation of theirs, God was pleased to reveal Himself of old. That writing, that investiture, so to speak, of God, was first wiped out, soiled and rendered worthless, and then nailed to the Cross—abrogated and suspended there. Thus God stripped off the principalities and the powers—divested Himself of, put off from Himself, that ministration of angels, manifesting Himself henceforward without a veil in the exalted Person of Jesus. And the act of triumph, by which God has for ever subjected all principality and power to Christ, and made Him to be the only Head of His people, in whom they are complete, was that sacrifice, whereby all the law was accomplished. In that, the principalities and powers were all subjected to Christ, all plainly declared to be powerless as regards His work and His people, and triumphed over by Him, see Phil. ii. 8, 9: Eph. i. 20, 21. No difficulty need be created, on this explanation, by the objection, that thus more prominence would be given to angelic agency in the law than was really the fact: the answer is, that the prominence which is given, is owing to the errors of the false teachers, who had evidently associated the Jewish observances in some way with the worship of angels: St. Paul’s argument will go only to this, that whatever part the angelic powers may have had, or be supposed to have had, in the previous dispensation, all such interposition was now entirely at an end, that dispensation itself being once for all antiquated and put away. Render then,—Putting off (by the absence of a copula, the vigour of the sentence is increased. The participle is contemporary with “hath taken out of the way” above, and thus must not be rendered “having put off”) the governments and powers (before spoken of, ver. 10, and ch. i. 16: see above), He (God, who is the subject throughout: see also ch. iii. 3:—not Christ, which would awkwardly introduce two subjects into the sentence) exhibited them (as completely subjected to Christ;—not only put them away from Himself, but shewed them as placed under Christ) in (element in which he made a show of them) openness (of speech; declaring and revealing by the Cross that there is none other but Christ the Head of all principality and power. Observe, that “in openness” is equivalent in English to openly), triumphing over them (as in 2 Cor. ii. 14, we are said [see note there] to be led captive in Christ’s triumph, our real victory being our defeat by Him,—so here the principalities and powers, which are next above us in those ranks of being which are all subjected to and summed up in Him) in Him (Christ: not, as A. V., “in it,” viz. the cross, which gives a very feeble meaning after the declaration that God “raised Him,” and “quickeneth us together with Him” above).

16—23.] More specific warning against false teachers (see summary on ver. 1), and that first (vv. 16, 17) with reference to legal observances and abstinence.

13.] Let no one therefore (because this is so—that ye are complete in Christ, and that God in Him hath put away and dispensed with all that is secondary and intermediate) judge you (pronounce judgment of right or wrong over you, sit in judgment on you) in eating (not, in St. Paul’s usage, meat as A. V.) and in drinking (i.e. in the matter of the whole cycle of legal ordinances and prohibitions which regarded eating and drinking: these two words being perhaps taken not separately and literally,—for there does not appear to have been in the law any special prohibition against drinks,—but as forming together a category in ordinary parlance. If however it is desired to press each word, the reference of “drinking” must be to the Nazarite vow, Numb. vi. 3), or in respect of feasts or new moon, or sabbaths (i.e. yearly, monthly, or weekly celebrations): 17.] which (the relative may refer either to the aggregate of

Or it may refer to all) is (or, are; not, 'was;' he speaks of them in their nature, abstractedly) a shadow of things to come (the blessings of the Christian covenant: these are the substance, and the Jewish ordinances the mere type or resemblance, as the shadow is of the living man); but the body (the substance, of which the other is the shadow) belongs to Christ (i. e. the substantial blessings, which those legal observances typified, are attached to, brought in by, found in union with, Christ: see on the whole figure, Heb. viii. 5; x. 1). We may observe, that if the ordinance of the Sabbath had been, in any form, of lasting obligation on the Christian church, it would have been quite impossible for the Apostle to have spoken thus. The fact of an obligatory rest of one day, whether the seventh or the first, would have been directly in the teeth of his assertion here: the holding of such would have been still to retain the shadow, while we possess the substance. And no answer can be given to this by the transparent special-pleading, that he is speaking only of that which was Jewish in such observances: the whole argument being general, and the axiom of ver. 17 universally applicable.

This imputes to the false teachers not only error, but insidious designs also) defraud you of your prize (this deprivation of their prize, and this wrong, they would suffer at the hands of those who would draw them away from Christ the giver of the prize [2 Tim. iv. 8; James i. 12; 1 Pet. v. 4] and lower them to the worship of intermediate spiritual beings. "There were some old heretics who said, that it was not fitting to call on Christ to help us, or for access to God, but on the angels, for that the calling on Christ for these benefits was a privilege beyond our deserts. This they said in a kind of humility." Chrysostom) in (as the element and sphere of his defrauding) lowliness of mind (Augustine, Confessions, x. 42, says: "Whom could I find to reconcile me to Thee? Should I go to the angels? Many, striving to return to Thee, and not sufficient of themselves to do so, have, as I hear, attempted this, and have fallen into a longing for curious visions, and have been delivered up to illusions." So that no ironical sense need be supposed) and (explicative, or appending a specific form of the general lowliness of mind) worship of the angels (genitive objective, 'worship paid to the holy angels.' With reference to the fact of the existence of such teaching at Colossæ, Theodoret gives an interesting notice: "They who were the supporters of the law taught them also to worship the angels, saying that by them the law was given. And this weakness remained in Phrygia and Pisidia for a long time: insomuch that a council which assembled in Laodicea of Phrygia forbade the praying to the angels: and even to this day one is shewn oratories of St. Michael among the Phrygians and their neighbours." The canon of the council of Laodicea [A.D. 360] runs thus: "It is not fitting that Christians should leave the church of God and go astray, and call on angels, and make celebrations to them in unlawful ways. If therefore any be found employed in this covert idolatry, let him be accursed, inasmuch as he is a denier of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and a pervert to idolatry." See, for an account of subsequent legends and visions of the neighbourhood, Conybeare and Howson, Life of St. Paul, ii. p. 480, note, edn. 2), insisting on things which he hath seen (an inhabitant of the realm of sight, not of faith: as Augustine above, "falling into a longing for curious visions."—This insisting on his own

Wherewith the body is supplied and compounded, is here left to be inferred, and need not be, as by some Commentators, minutely pursued into detail. It is, spiritual life, and growth:—the being, and well-being, as Chrysostom. The supply is as the sap to the vine: as all sensation and motion to the body), increaseth with the increase of God (i.e. 'the increase wrought by God,'—

God being the first cause of life to the whole, and carrying on this growth in subordination to and union with the Head, Jesus Christ.—The Roman Catholic Commentators endeavour by all kinds of evasions to escape the strong bearing of this passage on their following (and outdoing) of the heretical practices of the Judaizing teachers in this matter of the worship of the angels. One of them, Bispington, remarks,—“It is plain from this passage, as indeed from the nature of things, that the Apostle is not blaming every honouring of the angels, but only such honouring as put them in the place of Christ. The true honouring of the angels and saints is after all in every case an honouring of Christ their Head.” On this I may remark 1) that the word 'honouring' is simply disingenuous, there being no question of honouring, but of worship in the strict sense. 2) That whatever a Commentator may say in his study, and Romanists may assert when convenient to them, the honour and worship actually and practically paid by them to angels and saints does by very far exceed that paid to Christ their Head. Throughout Papal Europe, the worship of Christ among the body of the middle and lower orders is fast becoming obliterated, and supplanted by that of His Mother).

The same word is used by St. Paul of honour or respect bestowed on the body, in 1 Cor. xii. 23, 24: of honourable conduct in matters relating to the body, 1 Thess. iv. 4: and such is the meaning I would assign to it here—these ordinances have the repute of wisdom for, &c., and for unsparingness of the body, not in any real honour done to it—its true honour being, dedication to the Lord, 1 Cor. vi. 13), to the satiating of the flesh. I connect these words not with the preceding clause, but with "are ye prescribed to" above—why are ye suffering yourselves to be thus prescribed to [in the strain "touch not, &c." according to, &c., which are, &c.], and all for the satisfaction of the flesh,—for the following out of a teaching, the ground of which is the puffed up according to the fleshly mind, ver. 18? inference, see ch. ii. 20) ye were raised up together with Christ (not as A. V. 'are risen': the allusion, as above, ch. ii. 11—13, is to a definite time, your baptism. And it is important to keep this in view, that we may not make the mistake so commonly made, of interpreting this being raised in an ethical sense, and thereby stultifying the sentence—for if the participation were an ethical one, what need to exhort them to its ethical realization? The participation is an objective one, brought about by that faith which was the condition of their baptismal admission into Him. This faith the Apostle exhorts them to energize in the ethical realization of this resurrection state), seek the things above (heavenly, spiritual things: compare Matt. vi. 33; Gal. iv. 26; Phil. iii. 20), where Christ is (if you are united to Him, you will be tending to Him; and He is in heaven), sitting on the right hand of God (see Eph. i. 20. Here, as every where, when the present state of Christ is spoken of, the Ascension is taken for granted).

2.] Set your mind on (or, care for) the things above (extending to the whole region of their thought and desire), not the things on the earth (compare Phil. iii. 19: i. e. matters belonging to this present mortal state—earthly pleasure, self, and pride).

3.] For ye died (ch. ii. 12: 'are dead,' though allowable, is not so good as merely asserting a state, whereas the other recalls the fact of that state having been entered on. That being made partakers with Christ's death, cut you loose from the things on the earth: see Rom. vi. 4—7), and your life (that resurrection life, which is "your real and true life." The only real life of the Christian is his resurrection life in and with Christ. Compare Rom. viii. 19—23) is hidden ("is not yet manifested," 1 John iii. 2: is laid up, to be manifested hereafter: that such is the sense, the next verse seems plainly to shew) with Christ (who is also Himself hidden at present from us, who wait for His revelation [1 Cor. i. 7. 2 Thess. i. 7. 1 Pet. i. 7, 13; iv. 13], which shall be also ours, see ver. 4 and Rom. viii. 19) in God (with Christ who is "in the bosom of the Father";—it is in Him, as in a great depth, that all things concealed are hidden, and He brings them out as seems good to Him).

4.] When Christ is manifested (shall emerge from his present state of hiddenness, and be personally revealed), who is our (no emphasis—our applies to Christians generally—see on "ye also" below) life (Christ is personally Himself that life, and we possess it only by union with Him and His resurrection: see John xiv. 19), then shall ye also (also takes out the special from the general—ye, as well as and among, other Christians) with Him be manifested in glory (see on the whole, the parallel 1 John iii. 2. Though the completed life of the resurrection seems so plainly pointed out by this last verse as the sense to be given to "our life," this has not been seen by many Commentators, who hold it to be ethical; hidden, inasmuch as inward and spiritual, Rom. ii. 29, and ideal: or, inasmuch as it is unseen by the world. The root of the mistake has been the want of a sufficiently comprehensive view of that resurrection life of ours which is now hidden with Christ. It includes in itself both spiritual, ethical, and corporeal: and the realization of it as far as possible, here, is the sum of the Christian's most earnest endeavours: but the life itself, in its full manifestation, is that perfection of body, soul, and spirit, in which we shall be manifested with Him at His appearing. Theodoret says well: "For

He is therefore an idolater, in the deepest and worst, namely, in the practical significance), Meyer) unto perfect knowledge (which excludes all falsehood, and indeed all the vices mentioned above) according to the image of Him that created him (the new creation of the spirit unto fulness of knowledge and truth, the highest form of which would be the perfect knowledge of God, is regarded by the Apostle as analogous to man's first creation. As he was then made in the image of God, so now: but it was then his naturally, now spiritually in perfect knowledge. Thus the rule and method of the renewal is, "after the image of Him that created him" [the new man],—i. e. God, who is ever the Creator, not Christ. To understand the whole passage as referring to a restoration of the image of God in the first creation, is to fall far short of the glorious truth. It is not to restore the old, but to create the new, that redemption has been brought about. Whatever may have been God's image in which the first Adam was created, it is certain that the image of God, in which Christ's Spirit re-creates us, will be as much more glorious than that, as the second man is more glorious than the first):

The proper contrast to Barbarian would have been Greek, which has been already expressed), Scythian (the Scythians were esteemed the most barbarous of the barbarous), bond, free (he perhaps does not say 'bond and free,' because these relations actually subsisted: but the persons in them were not thus regarded in Christ—no man is, as a Christian, bond, nor [see also Gal. iii. 28] free): but CHRIST is all (every distinctive category of humanity is done away as to worth or privilege, and all have been absorbed into and centre in this one, to be Christ's, yea to be Christ—His members, in vital union with Him), and in all (equally sprinkled on, living in, working through and by every class of mankind).

<sup>14.]</sup> But (the contrast lies between all these things, which have been individually mentioned, and over all these things, that which must over-lie them as a whole) over (carrying on the image of putting on in ver. 12—see below. The A. V., 'above all these things,' looks ambiguous, bearing the meaning, "more especially than all these things:" but by repeating 'put on,' it seems as if our translators meant 'above' to be taken locally and literally) all these things (put on) love (in the original, "the love:" and the article gives a fine and delicate sense here, which we cannot express—not merely love, but 'the [well-known] love which becomes Christians:' the nearest rendering would perhaps be 'Christian love,' but it expresses too much), which [thing] (there is a slight causal force,—'for it is') is the bond of perfectness (the idea of an upper garment, or perhaps of a girdle, seems to have been before the Apostle's mind. This completes and keeps together all the rest, which, without it, are but the scattered elements of completeness. Those who, as some of the Roman Catholic expositors (not Bispington), find here justification by works, must be very hard put to discover support for that doctrine. The whole passage proceeds upon the ground of previous justification by faith: see ch. ii. 12, and our ver. 12).

inference, 'and so;') compare Eph. iv. 3, where peace is the bond. It is exceedingly interesting to observe the same word occurring in the same trains of thought in the two Epistles, but frequently with different application. See the Introd. to this Epistle, § iv. 7) let Christ's peace (the peace which He brings about, which He left as his legacy to us [John xiv. 27], which is emphatically and solely His. This peace, though its immediate and lower reference here is to mutual concord, yet must not on account of the context be limited to that lower side. Its reference is evidently wider, as its office of ruling shews: see below. It is the whole of Christ's Peace in all its blessed character and effects) rule (sit umpire—be enthroned as decider of every thing) in your hearts, —to which (with a view to which, as your blessed state of Christian perfection in God—see Isa. xxvi. 3; lvii. 19: Eph. ii. 14—17) ye were also (the also marks the introduction of an additional motive—"to which, besides my exhortation, ye have this motive: that," &c.) called (by God) in one body (as members of one body—oneness of body being the sphere and element in which that peace of Christ was to be carried on and realized. This reminiscence refers to the whole context from ver. 8, in which the exhortations had been to mutual Christian graces); and be ye thankful (to God, who called you: so the context before and after certainly demands: not 'one to another.' See Eph. v. 4; and ib. 19, 20: where the same class of exhortations occurs). <sup>16.]</sup> "Having exhorted them to be thankful, he now shews them the way." Chrysostom. or in actual songs of praise. Let Christ's word (the Gospel: genitive subjective; the word which is His—He spoke it, inspired it, and gives it power) dwell in you (not 'among you.' St. Paul's usage seems to require that the indwelling should be individual and personal. Still we may say that the "you" need not be restricted to individual Christians; it may well mean the whole community—you, as a church. The word dwelling in them richly, many would arise to speak it to edification, and many would be moved to the utterance of praise) richly (i. e. in abundance and fulness, so as to lead to the following results); in all wisdom (these words seem to be better taken with the following than with the foregoing. For 1) ch. i. 28 already gives us these two same participles, "teaching and admonishing," joined with "in all wisdom." 2) The verb "dwell" has already its qualifying adverb "richly" emphatically placed at the end of the sentence. 3) The two following clauses will thus correspond—"in all wisdom teaching" . . . "in grace singing." The usual arrangement has been, with A. V., to join them with the preceding) teaching and warning (see on ch. i. 28) each other (see on ver. 13) in psalms, hymns, spiritual songs (on the meaning of the words, see notes, Eph. v. 19. Meyer's note here is important: "Notice moreover that Paul here also [see on Eph. as above] is not speaking of 'divine service' properly so called, for this teaching and admonishing is required of his readers generally and mutually, and as a proof of their rich possession of the word of Christ: but of the communication of the religious life among one another (e. g. at meals, at the Agapæ (love-feasts), and other meetings, in their family circles, &c.), wherein spiritual influence caused the mouth to overflow with the fulness of the heart, and gave utterance to brotherly instruction and reproof in the higher form of psalms, &c.; perhaps in songs already known,—or extemporized, according to the peculiarity and productivity of each man's spiritual gift: perhaps sung by individuals alone [which would especially be the case when they were extemporized], or in chorus, or in the form of antiphonal song." Religious singing was common in the ancient church, independently of 'divine service' properly so called. Eusebius testifies to the existence of a collection of rhythmical songs which were composed from the first by Christians. On singing at the Agapæ, Tertullian says, "After water for the hands, and lights, have been brought, as each is able, from the Holy Scriptures or his own genius, he is encouraged to sing publicly to God"), in [the] Grace (the grace—of Christ. The article marks 'the grace,' which is yours by God's indwelling Spirit) singing in your hearts to God (this clause has generally been understood as qualifying the former. But such a view is manifestly wrong. That former spoke of their teaching and warning one another in effusions of the spirit which took the form of psalms, &c.: in other words, dealt with their intercourse with one another; this on the other hand deals with their own private intercourse with God. The second participle is co-ordinate with the former, not subordinate to it. The mistake has partly arisen from imagining that the former clause related to public worship, in its external form: and then this one was understood to enforce the genuine heartfelt expression of the same. But this not being so, that which is founded on it falls with it. The singing to God is an analogous expression to that in 1 Cor. xiv. 28,—"Let him speak . . . to God." So the words "in your hearts" describe the method of uttering this praise, viz. by the thoughts only: "to God" designates to whom it is to be addressed,—not, as before, to one another, but to God). <sup>17.</sup> General exhortation, comprehending all the preceding

18—IV. 1.] SPECIAL EXHORTATIONS TO RELATIVE SOCIAL DUTIES: 18, 19, to the married: 20, 21, to children and parents: 22—IV. 1, to slaves and masters.—Seeing that such exhortations occur in Ephesians also in terms so very similar, we are not justified in assuming that there was any thing in the peculiar circumstances of the Colossian church, which required more than common exhortation of this kind. It has been said, that it is only in Epistles addressed to the Asiatic churches, that such exhortations are found: but in this remark the entirely general character of the Epistle to the Ephesians is forgotten. Besides, the exhortations of the Epistle to Titus cannot be so completely severed from these as to be set down in another category.—See throughout the section, for such matters as are not remarked on, the notes to Eph. v. 22—vi. 9.

18.] The words in the Lord belong to "it is fit," not to "submit yourselves," as is shown by the parallel expression in ver. 20: was fitting, in that element of life designated by "in the Lord."

In the words "that they be not disheartened" it is assumed that the result of such irritation will be to cause repeated punishment, and so eventual desperation, on the part of the child. It would be well if all who have to educate children took to heart Bengel's remark here: "A broken spirit is the pest of youth."

24.] Equivalent to Eph. vi. 5, but more specific as to the Christian reward. knowing as ye do . . . The words of the Lord are emphatically prefixed—"that it is from the Lord that you shall . . ." You must look to Him, not to men, as the source of all Christian reward. Here the word recompense would appear to be used with a marked reference to their present state of slavery, the compensation. The very word inheritance should have kept the Roman Catholic expositors from introducing the merit of good works here.—The last clause, without the "for," is best taken imperatively, as a general comprehension of the course of action prescribed in the former part of the verse: serve ye the Lord Christ. 25.] This verse seems best to be taken as addressed to the slaves by way of encouragement to regard Christ as their Master, and serve Him—seeing that all their wrongs in this world, if they leave them in His hands, will be in due time righted by Him, the just judge, with whom there is no respect of persons.

For he that doeth wrong shall receive (see, as on the whole, Eph. vi. 5) that which he did wrongfully (the tense is changed because in the first case he is speaking of present practice—in the second, he has transferred the scene to the day of the Lord, and the wrong is one of past time): and there is not respect of persons. At His tribunal, every one, without regard to rank or wealth, shall receive the deeds done in the body. So that in your Christian uprightness and conscientiousness you need not fear that you shall be in the end overborne by the superior power of your masters: there is a judge who will defend and right you.

Certainly this is the meaning,—and not, as ordinarily understood, that he might boldly declare the Gospel in his imprisonment.

buying up opportunities.] See on Eph. v. 16. The opportunity for what, will be understood in each case from the circumstances, and our acknowledged Christian position as watching for the cause of the Lord.

6.] Let your speech (to those without still) be always in (as its characteristic element) grace (i.e. gracious, and winning favour: compare Luke iv. 22), seasoned with salt (not insipid and void of point, which can do no man any good: we must not forget that both these words have their spiritual meaning: grace, so common an one as to have almost passed out of its ordinary acceptance into that other,—the grace which is conferred on us from above, and which our words and actions should reflect:—and salt, as used by our Saviour in Mark ix. 50, as symbolizing the unction, freshness, and vital briskness which characterizes the Spirit’s presence and work in a man. There seems to be no allusion here to the conservative power of salt: the matter in hand at present is not avoiding corrupt conversation. Still less does the meaning of wit belong to this place. A local allusion is just possible: we are told by Herodotus that there was a lake from which salt was made in the neighbourhood of Colossæ, that ye may know.] Compare 1 Pet. iii. 15, which however is but one side of that readiness which is here recommended.

It implies that there were painful circumstances of trial, to which the subsequent mention of comfort also has reference. "He hints that they were in trouble." Chrysostom.

9. with Onesimus] There can hardly be a doubt [compare ver. 17 with Philem. 2, 10 ff.] that this is the Onesimus of the Epistle to Philemon.

one of you] Most probably, a native of your town.

10—14.] Various greetings from brethren.

10.] Aristarchus was a Thessalonian (Acts xx. 4), first mentioned Acts xix. 29, as dragged into the theatre at Ephesus during the tumult, together with Gaius, both being "fellow-travellers of Paul." He accompanied Paul to Asia (ib. xx. 4), and was with him in the voyage to Rome (xxvii. 2). In Philem. 24, he sends greeting, with Marcus, Demas, and Lucas, as here. On fellow-prisoner Meyer suggests an idea, which may without any straining of probability be adopted, and which would explain why Aristarchus is here "fellow-servant," and in Philem. 23, "fellow-prisoner," whereas Epaphras is here, ch. i. 7, merely a "fellow-prisoner," and in Philem. 23, a "fellow-worker." His view is, that the Apostle's friends may have voluntarily shared his imprisonment by turns: and that Aristarchus may have been his fellow-prisoner when he wrote this Epistle, Epaphras when he wrote that to Philemon. "Fellow-prisoner" belongs to the same image of warfare, as "fellow-soldier," Phil. ii. 25; Philem. 2.

Mark] can hardly be other than John Mark, compare Acts xii. 12, 25, who accompanied Paul and Barnabas in part of their first missionary journey, and because he turned back from them at Perga (ib. xiii. 13; xv. 38), was the subject of dispute between them on their second journey. That he was also the Evangelist, is matter of pure tradition, but not therefore to be rejected.

cousin] not "sister's son:"—this is a mistake, or at all events, as has been suggested, an obsolete way of expressing the relation which we know as cousin.

touching whom . . .] What these commands were, must be left in entire uncertainty. They had been sent previous to the writing of our Epistle, but from, or by whom, we know not. They concerned Marcus, not Barnabas: and one can hardly help connecting them, associated as they are with the command following, with the dispute of Acts xv. 38. It is very possible, that in consequence of the rejection of John Mark on that occasion by St. Paul, the Pauline portion of the churches may have looked upon him with suspicion.

11. Jesus, which is called Justus] Entirely unknown to us. A Justus is mentioned Acts xviii. 7, as an inhabitant of Corinth, and a proselyte: but there is no further reason to identify the two. The surname Justus was common among the Jews: see for example, Acts i. 23.

These alone who are of the circumcision (this leaves untouched the fact that there were other fellow-workers, not of the circumcision, who had been a comfort to him. The Judaistic teachers were for the most part in opposition to St. Paul: compare his complaint, Phil. i. 15, 17) are my fellow-workers towards the kingdom of God, men that proved (i.e. inasmuch as they proved). The past tense alludes to some event recently passed: to what precisely,

On Epaphras, see ch. i. 7 note. By mentioning Epaphras's anxious prayers for them, he works further on their affections, giving them an additional motive for steadfastness, in that one of themselves was thus striving in prayer for them.

13.] On account of this mention of Laodicea and Hierapolis, some have thought that Epaphras was the founder of the three churches. See Introduct. § ii. 2, 7. LAODICEA was a city of Phrygia Magna, large and rich (Rev. iii. 17; and Introduct. to Rev. § iii. 13; and Tacitus says that when destroyed by an earthquake, the inhabitants rebuilt it without imperial assistance), on the river Lycus, formerly called Diospolis, and afterwards Rhoas; its subsequent name was from Laodice, queen of Antiochus II. In A.D. 62, Laodicea, with Hierapolis and Colossæ, was destroyed by an earthquake (see above), to which visitations the neighbourhood was very subject. There is now on the spot a desolate village called Eski-hissar, with some ancient ruins.

Hierapolis] Six Roman miles north from Laodicea:

famed for mineral springs (Strabo describes them at length, also the caverns which exhale noxious vapour), which are still flowing.

14.] This Luke has ever been taken for the Evangelist: Introduct. to St. Luke, § i. In the designation, the beloved physician, there may be a trace of what has been supposed, that it was in a professional capacity that he first became attached to St. Paul, who evidently laboured under grievous sickness during the earlier part of the journey where Luke first appears in his company. Compare Gal. iv. 13 note, with Acts xvi. 6, 10. But this is too uncertain to be more than an interesting conjecture.

Demas] one of Paul's fellow-workmen, Philem. 24, who however afterwards deserted him, from love to the world, 2 Tim. iv. 10. The absence of any honourable or endearing mention here may be owing to the commencement of this apostasy, or some unfavourable indication in his character.

Introd. to Eph. § ii. 17, 19; and Philem. § iii. 2, 3. I only indicate here the right rendering of the words. They cannot well be taken, as some whom Chrysostom mentions took them, to mean, an Epistle from them to St. Paul, both on account of the awkwardness of the sense commanding them to read an Epistle sent from Laodicea, and not found there, and on account of the phrase in the original. We may safely say that a letter not from, but to the Laodiceans is meant. For the construction of this latter sentence, "cause," before "that," is of course to be supplied.

17.] Archippus is mentioned Philem. 2, and called the Apostle's fellow-soldier. I have treated on the inference to be drawn from this passage as to his abode, in the Introd. to Philemon, § iii. 1. He was evidently some officer of the church, but what, in the wideness of the term "ministry," we cannot say: and conjectures are profitless. Meyer well remarks, that the authority hereby implied on the part of the congregation to exercise reproof and discipline over their teachers is remarkable: and that the hierarchical turn given to the passage by some, making it mean that they were not to be surprised if he did fulfil his ministry eventually, by rebuking them (! so Theophylact, &c.), belongs to a later age.

Look to the ministry which thou receivedst in the Lord (the sphere of the reception of the ministry; in which the recipient lived and moved and promised at his ordination: not, of the ministry itself,—nor is in to be diverted from its simple local meaning), that (aim and end of the looking,—in order that) thou fulfil it.

18.] AUTOGRAPH SALUTATION. See ref. 1 Cor., where the same words occur.

Remember my bonds] These words extend further than to mere pecuniary support, or even mere prayers: they were ever to keep before them the fact that one who so deeply cared for them, and loved them, and to whom their perils of false doctrine occasioned such anxiety, was a prisoner in chains: and that remembrance was to work and produce its various fruits—of prayer for him, of affectionate remembrance of his wants, of deep regard for his words. When we read of 'his chains,' we should not forget that they moved over the paper as he wrote. His right hand was chained to the soldier that kept him. Compare Eph. vi. 24; 1 Tim. vi. 21; 2 Tim. iv. 22; Tit. iii. 15. Grace] literally the grace: see ch. iii. 16. 'The grace' in which we stand (Rom. v. 2): it seems to be a form of valediction belonging to the later period of the Epistles of St. Paul.

CHAP. I. 1.] ADDRESS AND GREETING. The Apostle names Silvanus and Timothy with himself, as having with him founded the church at Thessalonica, see Acts xvi. 1; xvii. 14. Silvanus is placed before Timothy, then a youth (Acts xvi. 1 f., see further in Introd. to 1 Tim. § i. 3, 4), as being one "chief among the brethren" (Acts xv. 22, 32; xviii. 5), and a prophet (ib. xv. 32, see also 2 Cor. i. 19; 1 Pet. v. 12). He does not name himself an Apostle, probably because his Apostleship needed not any substantiation to the Thessalonians. For the same reason he omits the designation in the Epistle to the Philippians. unto the church] So in 2 Thess., Gal., 1 and 2 Cor.: in the other Epistles, viz. Rom., Eph., Col., Phil., more generally, e.g.,—"to all that are in Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints." This is most probably accounted for by the circumstances of the various Epistles. We may notice that the genitive plural of the persons constituting the church occurs only in the addresses of these two Epistles. We may render 'of Thessalonians,' or 'of the Thessalonians:' better the former. in God the Father marks them as not being heathens,—and the Lord Jesus Christ as not being Jews.—The in, as usual, denotes communion and participation in, as the element of spiritual life. "Grace and peace from God be unto you, that you who are deprived of human favour and secular peace, may have both these with God." Anselm. The words which follow in the A. V., are not yet added in this, St. Paul's first Epistle. Afterwards they become a common formula with him.

2—III. 13.] FIRST PORTION OF THE EPISTLE, in which he pours out his heart to the Thessalonians respecting all the circumstances of their reception of and adhesion to the faith.

2—10.] Jowett remarks, that few passages are more characteristic of the style of St. Paul than this one: both as being the overflowing of his love in thankfulness for his converts, about whom he can never say too much: and as to the very form and structure of the sentences, which seem to grow under his hand, gaining force in each successive clause by the repetition and expansion of the preceding.

understood of the Apostle alone, as it is by many Commentators. For undoubted as it is that he often, e. g. ch. iii. 1, 2, where see note, uses the plural of himself alone, yet it is as undoubted that he uses it also of himself and of his fellow-labourers—e. g., 2 Cor. i. 18, 19. always for you all]

We have the same alliteration Eph. v. 20. On the latter words in this verse, see Rom. i. 9 f.

unceasingly seems, by the nearly parallel place, Rom. i. 9, to belong to what goes before, not to what follows. Such a formula would naturally repeat itself, as far as specifications of this kind are concerned.

3.] faith, love, hope, are the three great Christian graces of 1 Cor. xiii. See also ch. v. 8; Col. i. 4, 5.

the labour of your love] probably towards the sick and needy strangers, compare Acts xx. 35; Rom. xvi. 6, 12. of . . . love, not as springing from, but as belonging to, love,—characterizing it.

the endurance (or, patience) of your hope— i. e. endurance (in trials) which belongs to (see above), characterizes, your hope; and also nourishes it, in turn: compare Rom. xv. 4. of our Lord Jesus Christ] specifies the hope—that it is a hope of the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ (compare ver. 10). Olshansen refers the words to all three preceding substantives—but this seems alien from St. Paul's style. On all the three Jowett says well, "Your faith, hope, and love; a faith that had its outward effect on your lives: a love that spent itself in the service of others: a hope that was no mere transient feeling, but was content to wait for the things unseen when Christ should be revealed."

before God connects most naturally with ver. 2—making mention . . . before God: not to the genitives preceding (see Rom. iv. 17; xiv. 22).

4.] knowing refers back to remembering,

in that we know—or, for we know. It must not be paraphrased "in that ye know," as some have done. The words by God belong to "beloved," as in 2 Thess. ii. 13, see also Rom. i. 7: not, as A. V., to "your election," which is an ungrammatical rendering.

The word election must not be softened down: it is the election unto life of individual believers by God, so commonly adduced by St. Paul (reff.: and 1 Cor. i. 27. your election, i. e. the election of you: knowing that God elected you. 5. Because]

Verses 5, 6 ff. are meant not to explain wherein their election consisted, but to give reasons in matter of fact for concluding the existence of that election. These reasons are (1) the power and confidence with which he and Silvanus and Timothy preached among them (ver. 5), and (2) the earnest and joyful manner in which the Thessalonians received it (vv. 6 ff.). Both these were signs of God's grace to them—tokens of their election vouchsafed by Him. our gospel] i. e. the gospel which we preached.

came unto you] literally, became to you—proved to be, in its approach to you. The preposition in, thrice repeated, indicates the form and manner in which the preaching was carried on, not that in which the Thessalonians received it, which is not treated till ver. 6. in power] not 'in miracles,' but in power of utterance and of energy. and in the Holy Ghost]

i. e. not only in force and energy, but in the Holy Ghost—in a manner which could only be ascribed to the operation of the Holy Spirit. in much confidence (of faith). This confidence (see above) was that in which Paul and Silvanus and Timothy preached to them: not that in which they received the preaching.

even as, &c.] Appeal to their knowledge that the fact was so. These words restrict the foregoing to the preachers, as explained above. This interpretation is fixed by the term even as, referring back to the whole previous description.

what manner of men we proved] The point of the fact appealed to is, the proof given, what manner of men they were, by the manner of their preaching. "The quality was evinced, in the power and confidence with which they delivered their message." Ellicott: the proof given by the manner of their preaching.

for your sakes] conveying the purpose of the Apostle and his colleagues, and in the background also the purpose of God—"you know what God enabled us to be,—how mighty in preaching the word,—for your sakes—thereby proving that He loved you, and had chosen you for His own." <sup>6.</sup>

Further proof of the same, that ye are elect, by the method in which you received the Gospel thus preached by us. It is somewhat difficult here to fix exactly the point of comparison, in which they imitated their ministers and Christ. Certainly it is not merely, in receiving the word—for to omit other objections, this would not apply at all to Him:—and therefore, not in any qualifying detail of their method of reception of the word.—So far being clear, we have but one particular left, and that respects the circumstances under which, and the spirit with which: and here we find a point of comparison even with Christ Himself: viz. joyful endurance in spirit under sufferings. This it was in which they imitated the Apostles, and their divine Master, and which made them patterns to other churches (see below).

—For this affliction in which they received the word, see Acts xvii 5—10; ch. ii. 14; iii. 2, 3, 5.

an example] said of the whole church as one. to all that believe] to the whole of the believers: not as Chrysostom understands it, all that believed before you: for it was not so: the only church in Europe which was in Christ before the Thessalonian, was the Philippian (Acts xvi. 12—xvii. 1; see ch. ii. 2).

Macedonia and Achaia, compare Rom. xv. 26; Acts xix. 21: the two Roman provinces, comprehending Northern and Southern Greece. There is no reference, as Theodoret thinks, to the Greeks being "very great nations, and admired for wisdom," and so their praise being the greater: these are mentioned simply because the Apostle had been, since their conversion, in Macedonia, and had left Silvanus and Timothy there,—and was now in Achaia.

hath sounded out] Chrysostom remarks that the similitude is from the clear sound of a trumpet, filling all the space surrounding. The sense seems to be that your ready reception and faith as it were sounded forth the word of the Lord, the Gospel message, loudly and clearly, through all parts.

10.] The especial aspect of the faith of the Thessalonians was hope: hope of the return of the Son of God from heaven: a hope, indeed, common to them with all Christians in all ages, but evidently entertained by them as pointing to an event more immediate than the church has subsequently believed it to be. Certainly these words would give them an idea of the nearness of the coming of Christ: and perhaps the misunderstanding of them may have contributed to the notion which the Apostle corrects, 2 Thess. ii. 1 ff.: see note there. It is evident from vv. 2 ff., that this does not here apply to the fruits, but to the character of his preaching: the result does not appear till ver. 13. And within this limitation, we may observe that the verb is hath been, not was; to be understood therefore not of any mere intent of the Apostle at the time of his coming among them, but of some abiding character of his preaching. It probably expresses, that his entering in was and continued 'no empty scheme' ('no light matter,' as we say), but an earnest, bold, self-denying endeavour for their good. This he proceeds to prove.

confidence is in God as our God. This word reproduces the feeling with which Paul and Silas opened their ministry among them. <sup>of God</sup> is expressed for solemnity, to add to the weight of their entering in. <sup>in</sup> (amidst) much conflict, viz. under outward circumstances conflicting much with our work: and therefore that work could be no empty thing, which was thus maintained.

3, 4.] Reasons why he was bold to speak . . . in much conflict:—viz. the true and single-minded character of his ministry, and his duty to God as the steward of the Gospel.

3.] our exhortation to you, viz. our whole course of preaching. There is in the original no verb after exhortation: but the sense of the sentence is present; not past, as in A. V.: compare "even so we speak" below.

impurity] hardly, as Chrysostom, "that we busied not ourselves with abominable matters, as magicians, &c. do,"—though such a reference is certainly possible, considering the vile degradation of that class at the period,—but here apparently of the impure desire of gain, compare ver. 5, where "in pretext of covetousness" seems to correspond with from impurity here.

in guile] This is said of the manner, or perhaps the ethical sphere, in which: "nor did we make use of deceit to win our way with our exhortation." See 2 Cor. ii. 17. <sup>4.] according as, in proportion as.</sup> we have been ap-

We must not introduce any ascertained fitness of them in themselves into the idea: it is only the free choice of God which is spoken of. pleasing, in the strict sense of the present tense,—going about to please,—striving to please. our hearts is not said generally, of all men: but of us, Paul and Silvanus and Timothy.

5 ff.] Proofs again of the assertions of vv. 3, 4. For neither did we become conversant in (i.e. in English, did we practise, as in the text) speech of (consisting of) flattery, as ye know, nor (did we become conversant) in pretext (employed in that which was meant to be a pretext) of (serving to conceal) avarice; God is witness (it has been observed, that he appeals to them as witnesses that he did not flatter them; but to God, who alone knows the hearts, that he had no selfish ends in view. But perhaps it is simpler to refer God is witness to the whole).

6.] The glory which they sought was not at all to come out of human sources, whether actually from the Thessalonians or from any others. though we might have been burdensome] Some refer this to covetousness, mentioned above, and understand it of using the power of living by the gospel, which St. Paul, &c., might have done, but did not: so ver. 9: 2 Thess. iii. 8; 2 Cor. xii. 16; xi. 9. from the mention of covetousness by the new idea beginning at ver. 6, to which, and not to the former clause, this is subordinated. I therefore take them with Chrysostom and many others, as referring to the claim of honour and deference, which as Apostles they might have put forward. They are equivalent to, when we might have stood on our dignity.

as (being) Apostles of Christ] It is simpler to take Apostles here in its wider sense, than to limit the sentence to St. Paul alone.

7.] But contrasts, not with the mere subordinate clause of the last verse (“though we might,” &c.), but with its whole sense, and introduces the positive side of their behaviour: as if it were said, ‘so far from being any of the aforesaid, we were . . .’

we proved, as before, were found by experience to be: became, as your estimate of us became more accurate and thorough.

among you] i.e. ‘in our converse with you;’ but with an allusion to our not lifting ourselves above you;—as being ourselves your fellows. The emphasis on her own should not be lost sight of—as when a nurse (a suckling mother) cherishes her own children. See Gal. iv. 19, for the same figure.

8.] thus belongs to became willing, and answers to as above. The expression our own lives, as remarked above, shews beyond doubt that he is including here Silas and Timothy with himself. The term to impart will not strictly apply to our own lives, but we must borrow from it the idea of giving, or offering.—The comparison is exceedingly tender and beautiful: as the nursing-mother, cherishing her children, joys to give not only her milk, but her life, for them,—so we, bringing up you as spiritual children, delighted in giving, not only the milk of the word, but even (and here it was matter of fact) our own lives, for your nourishment in Christ. And that, because ye became very dear unto us.

9.] Proof of the dearness of the Thessalonians to Paul and his companions: not of these last proving gentle among them, to which it would be irrelevant,—nor of their readiness to give their lives, &c., for this verse does not refer to dangers undergone, but to labour, in order not to trouble any.

working] in its strict meaning of manual labour—viz., at tent-cloth making, Acts xviii. 3.

night and day] The night is mentioned first, not merely because the Jews and Athenians so reckoned it, but for emphasis, being the most noteworthy, and the day following as matter of course. See ch. iii. 10; Mark v. 5; 2 Tim. i. 3; Isa. xxxiv. 10; Acts xx. 31.

that we might not burden any of you, viz. by accepting from you the means of sustenance. On the supposed inconsistency of the statement here with the narrative in Acts xvii., see Introd., § ii. 3, and note.

holiness is more a quality having respect to God: justice, to men. This distinction, perhaps precarious where the words occur separately, or seem to require no very precise application, is requisite here where both divine and human testimony is appealed to. toward you that believe] The former verse having referred to external occupation, in which he must have consorted with unbelievers, he here narrows the circle, to speak of his behaviour among the brethren themselves.

11, 12.] Appeal to the detailed judgment of each one, that this was so. This "holily and justly and unblameably" is substantiated by the fact, that St. Paul and his companions busied themselves in establishing every one of them in the faith.

11.] God calls us to His kingdom, the kingdom of our Lord Jesus, which He shall establish at His coming: and He calls us to His glory,—to partake of that glory in His presence, which our Lord Jesus had with Him before the world began; John xvii. 5, 24. See Rom. v. 2.

13.] for this cause is best and most simply referred to the fact announced in the preceding words—viz. that God calleth you unto His kingdom and glory, &c. Seeing that He is thus calling you, your thorough reception of His word is to us a cause of thanksgiving to Him.

we also, i.e. as well as all who believe in Macedonia and Achaia.

when ye received . . . ye accepted] The former verb denotes only the hearing, as objective matter of fact: the latter, the receiving into their minds as subjective matter of belief. There is a significant contrast, St. Paul distinguishing himself and his companions, as mere publishers, from God, the great Source of the Gospel.

ye accepted, not (no 'as' must be inserted: he is not speaking of the Thessalonians' estimate of the word, but [see above] of the fact of their receiving it as it really was) the word of men (having man for its author), but as it is in truth, the word of God, which (Bengel and others take which as referring to "God:" but the more probable reference is to the word: see the reason in my Greek Test.) is also (besides being merely heard) working in you that believe.

14.] Proof of this working,—that they had imitated in endurance the Judæan churches.

imitators] not in intention, but in fact. The reason for introducing this character of the Jews here was because (Acts xvii. 5 ff.) they had been the stirrers up of the persecution against himself and Silas at Thessalonica, to which circumstance he refers below. By the mention of them as the adversaries of the Gospel in Judæa he is carried on to say that there, as well as at Thessalonica, they had ever been his chief enemies. And this is a remarkable coincidence with the history in the Acts, where we find him at this time, in Corinth, in more than usual conflict with the Jews (Acts xviii. 5, 6, 12). the churches

These countrymen of the Thessalonians were not Jews, wholly nor in part, but Gentiles only. For they are set in distinct contrast here to the Jews. they, the members of the Judæan churches mentioned above.

15, 16.] Characterization of the Jews as enemies of the Gospel and of mankind. Jowett's note is worth quoting: "Wherever the Apostle had gone on his second journey, he had been persecuted by the Jews: and the longer he travelled about among Gentile cities, the more he must have been sensible of the feeling with which his countrymen were regarded. Isolated as they were from the rest of the world in every city, a people within a people, it was impossible that they should not be united for their own self-defence, and regarded with suspicion by the rest of mankind. But their inner nature was not less repugnant to the nobler as well as the baser feelings of Greece and Rome. Their fierce nationality had outlived itself: though worshippers of the true God, they knew Him not to be the God of all the nations of the earth: bated and despised by others, they could but cherish in return an impotent contempt and hatred of other men. What wonder that, for an instant (?) on all this see below), the Apostle should have felt that this Gentile feeling was not wholly groundless? or that he should use words which recall the expression of Tacitus, in characterizing the Jews,—'that they had the hatred of enemies towards all other nations?'" 15. killed Jesus the Lord] drove out us] by persecution, viz., from among you, Acts xvii. 5 ff. 16.] us refers to Paul and Silas. In the words are contrary to all men, most Commentators, and recently Jowett (see above), have seen the "hatred of the human race," ascribed to the Jews by Tacitus, and by several other classic authors. But it is hardly possible that St. Paul, himself a Jew, should have blamed an exclusiveness which arose from the strict monotheism and legal purity of the Jew: and besides this, the construction having been hitherto carried on by copulæ, but now dropping them, most naturally goes on from this contrariety to what next follows, viz., their forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles, specifying wherein the contrariety consists, viz. in opposing the salvation of mankind by the Gospel.

to the end that they may fill up their sins alway] This is said, not of the intention of the Jews themselves, but of their course of conduct, viewed as having an intent in the divine purposes: as so often in St. Paul. The meaning of the expression is, that they may bring up the measure of their sins to the prescribed point. But (this their opposition to God and men shall not avail them: for) the (predestined, or predicted, or merited) wrath (of God) came upon them (he looks back on the fact in the divine counsels as a thing in past time, i. e. 17.] But we resumes the subject broken off at ver. 13: the but introducing a contrast to the description of the Jews in vv. 15, 16. when we had been separated literally, orphaned of; bereaved of. for a short time literally, for the space of an hour. The expression refers, not to his present impression that the time of separation would still be short, but to the time alluded to in the preceding past participle—when we had been separated from you for the space of an hour.

the more abundantly (because our separation was so short. Lünemann says well: "Universal experience testifies, that the pain of separation from friends and the desire of return to them are more vivid, the more freshly the remembrance of the parting works in the spirit, i.e. the less time has elapsed since the parting") endeavoured (implies actual setting on foot of measures to effect it) in much desire (i.e. very earnestly) to see your face.

18. Wherefore (as following up this earnest endeavour) we would fain have come (had a plan to come) unto you, even I Paul (the introduction of these words here, where he is about to speak of himself alone, is a strong confirmation of the view upheld above [on ch. i. 9] that he has hitherto been speaking of himself and his companions), both once and again (literally, 'both once and twice:' meaning, that on two special occasions he had such a plan), and (not, 'but: the simple copula, as in Rom. i. 13, gives the matter of fact, without raising the contrast between the intention and the hindrance) Satan (i.e. the devil: not any human adversary or set of adversaries; whether Satan acted by the Thessalonian Jews or not, is unknown to us, but by whomsoever acting, the agency was his) hindered us.

in the presence of our Lord Jesus at his coming] The Apostle, after having asked and answered the question, "what is our hope? &c.," breaks off, and specifies that wherein this hope and joy mainly consisted, viz. the glorious prospect of their being found in the Lord at his appearing. But he does not look forward to this as anticipating a reward for the conversion of the Thessalonians, or that their conversion will compensate for his having persecuted the Church before, but from generous desire to be found at that day with the fruits of his labour, and that they might be his boast and be theirs before the Lord; see 2 Cor. i. 14; Phil. ii. 16.

20.] The words at his coming further specify what went before: that it is not merely in His presence, always about His people, but then, when He shall be clearly and finally manifested. I should be inclined to ascribe to ver. 20 a wider range than ver. 19 embraces: as if it had been said, you will be our joy in the day of the Lord: for ye are (at all times, ye are abstractedly) our glory and joy.

III. 1.] Wherefore, because of our affection for you just expressed; the narration which follows is the proof of his affection for them. being no longer able to forbear (our continued absence from communication with you), we (I Paul, from above, ch. ii. 18) thought it good (i.e. 'it was our pleasure') to be left behind (see Acts xvii. 15, 16) alone in Athens, 2.] and sent Timothy, our brother and fellow-worker with God in (the field of his working) the Gospel of Christ (there does not appear to be any special reason for this honourable mention of Timothy, further than the disposition to speak thus highly of him on the part of the Apostle. Such is the more natural view, when we take into account the fervid and affectionate heart of the writer. See, however, note on 1 Tim. v. 23; with which timid character of Timothy such designations as this may be connected), in order to confirm you, and exhort you on behalf of (in order for the furtherance of) your faith: 3.] that no one might be disquieted in these afflictions (which are

You were the object of our consolation: the faith which you shewed was the means whereby that object was applied to our minds. in (i.e. 'in the midst of,'—'in spite of') all our distress and affliction (what distress and affliction does not appear;—but clearly some external trouble, not care and anxiety for you, for this would be removed by the message of Timothy. We may well imagine such external trouble, from Acts xviii. 5—10):

8.] since now (not so much an adverb of time, here, as implying the fulfilment of the condition which follows) we live (the distress and affliction being conceived as a death: but not to be referred to everlasting life, as Chrysostom, but with reference to the infringement of the powers of life by distress and affliction: we are in full strength and freshness of life, we do not feel the sorrows and tribulations with which the outer world surrounds us), if ye stand fast in the Lord. There were (ver. 10) deficiencies in their faith, requiring filling up.

9.] And this vigour of life shews itself in the earnest desire of abundant thanksgiving: so the for accounts for, and specifies the action of, the "life" just mentioned. what—i.e. what sufficient—? what—i.e. what sufficient—? can we render again]

Thanks is itself a return for God's favours; see especially Ps. cxvi. 12. for all the joy] i.e. in return for. all the joy, i.e. not the joy from so many different sources, but the joy in its largeness and depth: as if he had said, this great joy.

before our God shews the joy to be of the very highest and best,—no joy of this world, or of personal pride, but one which will bear, and does bear, the searching eye of God, and is His joy (John xv. 11).

10. night and day] see on ch. ii. 9. praying, i.e. praying as we do, belongs to the question of ver. 9: as if it had been said, 'what thanks can we render, &c., proportioned to the earnestness of our prayers, &c.?' These defects were consequences of their being as yet novices in the faith: partly theoretical, e.g. their want of stability respecting the coming of the Lord, and of fixed ideas respecting those who had fallen asleep in Christ,—partly practical, ch. iv. 1.

11—13.] Good wishes, with respect to this his earnest desire, and to their continued progress in love and holiness.

11. himself] This word exalts the absolute power of God and the Lord Jesus—if He expedites the way, it will be accomplished. Himself then is in contrast with ourselves, who have once and again tried to come to you, but have been hindered by Satan.

direct] We cannot express in an English version what appears in the Greek, where this verb direct, though preceded by two personal nominatives, "God," and "our Lord Jesus," is in the singular number. This is the case also in 2 Thess. ii. 16, 17. It would be hardly possible that it should be so, unless some reason existed in the subjects of the verb. Mere unity of will between the Father and the Son would not be enough, unless absolute unity were also in the writer's mind. Athanasius therefore seems to be right in drawing from this construction an argument for the unity of the Father and the Son.

12. you yourselves] In the original it is you, in the emphatic place: i. e. whether we come or not. the Lord may refer either to the Father, or to Christ. I should rather understand it of the Father: see 2 Cor. ix. 8.

verb "stablish") before (Him who is) God and our Father (or, our God and Father. This ensures the genuineness of this absence of blame in holiness: that it should be not only before men, but also before God), at (in) the coming, &c. his saints—we need not enter into any question whether these are angels, or saints properly so called: the expression is an Old Test. one,—Zech. xiv. 5,—and was probably meant by St. Paul to include both. Certainly (2 Thess. i. 7; Matt. xxv. 31, al.) He will be accompanied with the angels: but also with the spirits of the just, compare ch. iv. 14.

1.] Furthermore has no reference to time, as Chrysostom, "always and for ever," but introduces this second portion, thus dividing it from the first, and implying the close of the Epistle. to please God in your walk and conduct:—to walk, and thereby to please God), even as also ye are walking, that ye abound yet more (viz. in thus walking).

2.] takes up the “as ye received of us” of the former verse, and appeals to their memory in its confirmation. See similar appeals in Gal. iv. 13; 1 Cor. xv. 1. by the Lord Jesus] i. e. coming from Him, by His order and appointment.

3.] Further specification (“for”) of these commands: see above. The words the will of God serve to take up again the preceding assertion that the commandments were given “by the Lord Jesus.” your sanctification is in apposition with the will of God, as a matter patent to all, the will of God respecting us being known to be, our sanctification, and then this sanctification being afterwards specified as consisting in abstinence from fornication. Therefore sanctification must be taken in the most general sense, and that which is afterwards introduced, as forming a part of our sanctification. your sanctification] i. e. the sanctification of you.

4.] On the meaning of the expression, his own vessel, there has been much difference. Very many Commentators understand it of ‘the body.’ But it is fatal to this interpretation, (1) that it must force an untenable meaning on the preceding verb, which can only mean ‘to acquire,’ not, as in A. V., ‘to possess.’ Chrysostom, whose sense of Greek usage led him to feel this, tries to fit the meaning ‘to acquire’ into the sense: saying, “We do really acquire the body, when it remains pure, and is in sanctification” (so Dr. Vaughan also). But this is lame enough, and would not, as De Wette remarks, answer for the other member of the sentence, “not in the lust of carnal desire.” (2) That the mere use of the word vessel, without any explanation, could hardly point at the body. In all the passages ordinarily quoted to support it, the metaphor is further explained by the context. 2 Cor. iv. 7 is evidently no case in point, the epithet “earthen” being there added, and the body being simply compared to an earthen vessel. (3) The order of the words in the original is against it, by which the whole stress is laid on the word own. This would be without meaning if “vessel” meant the body: for how could a man acquire another’s body? (4) But a more fatal objection than any of the former is, that the context is entirely against the meaning. The sanctification has been explained to consist in abstaining from fornication. And now this fornication comes to be specified, wherein it consists, and how it may be guarded against: viz. in carrying on the divinely-appointed commerce of the sexes in holiness and honour. In fact, the thought is exactly as in 1 Cor. vii. 2, “Because of fornications, let each man have his own wife, and let each woman have her own husband.” Many have therefore understood vessel in its literal meaning as applied to “the matter” in hand,—i. e. the woman (or indeed the man, on the other side, inasmuch as the woman has power over his body, see 1 Cor. vii. 4.—So that thus it would be an exhortation to the woman also). Thus the context would be satisfied, and the emphatic position of his own (as in 1 Cor. vii. 2);—and acquire would retain its proper meaning: that each of you should know how to acquire his own vessel (for this purpose) in sanctification and honour. This sense of vessel is found in the Jewish books; and the verb rendered “acquire” was commonly used of taking a wife. This interpretation is that of some of the principal among the ancients, including Augustine, and of many of the principal moderns. The objection to it alleged by Calvin and others, that thus only men would be addressed, is easily answered (besides as above, under 4) by observing that in other places also, where fornication is in question, the male only is exhorted, e. g. 1 Cor. vi. 15—18: the female being included by implication, and bound to interpret on her side that which is said of the other.

6.] I cannot help regarding it as most unnatural, to interpret this verse of a new subject introduced, viz. the not wronging one another in the business of life. How some of the best modern Commentators can have entertained this view, I am at a loss to imagine. For (1) the sense is carried on from vv. 4, 5, without any thing to mark a change of topic: and (2) when the Apostle sums up the whole in ver. 7, he mentions merely impurity, without the slightest allusion to the other. To say that more than one kind of sin must be mentioned because he speaks of "all these things" is mere trifling: this expression merely generalizes from the sin mentioned to a wider range. I understand the verse, with Chrysostom, and most of the ancients and moderns, to refer to the sins of uncleanness, and continue vv. 4, 5:—that he should not (viz. any of you, repeated from "every one of you" above) go beyond (or set at nought, which perhaps is more strictly accurate; but the word means both, and the other is perhaps best in English) and overreach his brother in the (i. e. this) matter (viz. of acquiring his own vessel—that there should be among you no strifes on account of the lusts of carnal desire. The matter, viz. which is now in hand: not,—nor can the words by any possibility mean, "any matter," as A. V.: nor "the business of life," as some have interpreted it: see above. "It is probable that the obscurity of the passage arises partly from the decency in which the Apostle clothes it." Jowett): because God is the avenger ('righter,' in such cases of setting at nought and overreaching) of all these things (viz. cases of going beyond and overreaching, and by inference, lustful sins like them), as also (see on ver. 5) we before told you and (constantly) testified.

7.] This verse (see above) is in my view decisive for the above rendering of ver. 6. There is no mention here of avarice: nor is it possible to understand the word uncleanness, when ver. 3 has gone before, of any thing but carnal impurity.

for] for the purpose of,—on condition of:—in, 'in the element of.' sanctification is the whole sphere of our Christian life.

8.] Hence, the sin of (rejecting) setting at nought such limitations and rules is a fearful one—no less than that of setting at nought God the giver of the Holy Spirit. In the words despise not man there is an obvious allusion to going beyond and overreaching above. There is no need to supply any thing after despise: he that despise simply describes him who commits the act of despising, the despiser—what he despises, is not to be supplied in the construction, but is clear from the context—viz. his brother.

who also gave] i. e. who also is the AUTHOR of our sanctification.

By the word also new force is given to the matter to be mentioned. It introduces a climax, whereby the sin is intensified.

gave—not giveth—once for all, as being one great definite act of God by his Son.

his Spirit, which is holy] I have retained here the form of the original rather than brotherly love here refers more immediately (compare ver. 10) to deeds of kindness by way of relief to poor brethren.

ye need not] This is a not unusual touch of delicate rhetoric with St. Paul (see 2 Cor. ix. 1: Philem. 19: ch. v. 1). It conveys tacit but gentle reproof. The knowledge and the practice already exist: but the latter is not quite in proportion to the former. "In saying, 'there is no need,' he makes it greater than if he had said, 'there was need.'" Chrysostom.

to abound, viz. in this love. There does not seem any reason, with Jowett, to ascribe the want of quietness, here implied, to be quiet, to their uneasiness about the state of the dead: much rather [as he also states: see below] to their mistaken anticipations of the immediate coming of the Lord. It would seem as if, notwithstanding their liberality to those without, there were some defect of diligence and harmony within which prompted this exhortation: see 2 Thess. iii. 11, 12. Theodoret assigns another reason for it: "This exhortation is not inconsistent with the foregoing praises.

For the state of things was, that one party zealously ministered charity to the needy, and that the latter on account of this zealous ministration neglected their own duties: he naturally therefore praised the one and gave fitting advice to the others." It has been objected to this, that thus the Church would be divided into two sections, the one exhorted to persist and abound in their liberality, the other to work diligently to support themselves; whereas there is no trace in the text of such a division. But we may well answer, that instances are frequent enough of exhortations being addressed to whole churches which in their application would require severing and allotting to distinct classes of persons.

and this section. It would certainly seem as if the preaching of the kingdom of Jesus at Thessalonica had been partially misunderstood, and been perverted into a cause why they should not quietly follow active life, and why they should be uneasy about those who fell asleep before that kingdom was brought in, imagining that they would have no part in its glories. Compare Acts xvii. 7.

<sup>13.</sup>] we (or I) would not have you ignorant . . . is with our Apostle (compare Rom. i. 13; xi. 25; 1 Cor. x. 1; xii. 1; 2 Cor. i. 8) a common formula of transition to the imparting of weighty information.

them which are sleeping] This was an expression (see reff.) conveying definite meaning to the Thessalonians as importing the dead in Christ (ver. 16). No inference must therefore be drawn from the Apostle's use of this word, as to the intermediate state: for the word is a mere common term.

that ye may not sorrow] object of my not wishing you to be ignorant. The word sorrow is absolute, that ye mourn not at all:—not to be joined with what follows, and to be made only to mean that ye sorrow not in the same manner as &c. He forbids mourning altogether. But we must remember, what sort of mourning it was. It was mourning for them: not mourning for our loss in their absence, but for theirs, and in so far, for ours also.

have no hope] viz. in the resurrection. Examples of this “no hope” are easily given from the Pagan writers. Lünemann cites,—Theocritus, “Hope goes with life—all hopeless are the dead.” Æschylus, “Once dead, there is no resurrection more.” Catullus, “Suns may set and may return: | We, when once our brief light wanes, | Have eternal night to sleep.” Lucretius, “None ever woke again | Whom the cold pause of life hath overta'en.” Jowett adds ‘the sad complaints of Cicero and Quintilian over the loss of their children, and the dreary hope of an immortality of fame in Tacitus and Thucydides.’ This shews of what kind their mourning was: viz. a grief whose ground was unbelief in a resurrection: which regarded the dead as altogether cut off from Christ's heavenly kingdom.

died and rose again go together,—forming the same process through which ‘the sleeping’ are passing. “The Apostle here, as always, uses the direct term ‘died’ in reference to our Lord, to obviate all possible misconception: in reference to the faithful he appropriately uses the consolatory term ‘sleep.’” Ellicott. even so] The two clauses do not accurately correspond.

We should expect “we believe also that even thus they who fell asleep through Jesus will rise again,” or the like. Still the even so betokens identity of lot for the two parties concerned, viz., death, and resurrection. In this they resemble: but in the expressed particulars here, they differ. Christ's was simply “rose again”: theirs shall be a resurrection through Him, at His coming.

which fell asleep through Jesus] On the necessary connexion of the words through Jesus with fell asleep, see in my Greek Test.

God will bring (back to us) with Him (Jesus): i. e. when Jesus shall appear, they also shall appear with Him, being (as below) raised at His coming. Of their disembodied souls there is here no mention: nor is the meaning, as often understood, that God will bring them (their disembodied souls, to be joined to their raised bodies) with Him: but the bringing them with Jesus, i. e. their being raised when Jesus appears.

which follows: taken up by that. in (virtue of: an assertion made within the sphere and element of that certainty, which the word of the Lord gives) the word of the Lord,—i.e. by direct revelation from Him made to me. "That is," says Chrysostom, "we say it not of ourselves, but having learned it from Christ." That St. Paul had many special revelations made to him, we know from 2 Cor. xii. 4. Compare also Gal. i. 12; Eph. iii. 3; 1 Cor. xi. 23; xv. 3, and notes. we

which are living] Then beyond question, he himself expected to be alive, together with the majority of those to whom he was writing, at the Lord's coming. For we cannot for a moment accept the evasion of Theodoret (so also Chrysostom and the majority of ancient Commentators, down to Bengel, and even some of the best of the moderns, warped by their subjectivities: even Ellicott here),—"that he said this not in his own person, but in that of the men who should be surviving at that time (!)"—nor the ungrammatical rendering of some, 'we, if we live and remain'—nor the idea of (Ecumenius, al., that we who live are the souls, they who sleep the bodies:—but must take the words in their only plain grammatical meaning, that we which are living, who remain behind, are a class distinguished from them which fell asleep, by being yet in the flesh when Christ comes, in which class, by prefixing we, he includes his readers and himself. That this was his expectation, we know from other passages, especially from 2 Cor. v. 1—10, where see notes. It does not seem to have been so strong towards the end of his course; see e.g. Phil. i. 20—26. Nor need it surprise any Christian, that the Apostles should in this matter of detail have found their personal expectations liable to disappointment, respecting a day of which it is so solemnly said, that no man knoweth its appointed time, not the angels in heaven, nor the Son (Mark xiii. 32), but the Father only. At the same time it must be borne in mind, that this inclusion of himself and his hearers among the "living and remaining behind" does not in any way enter into the fact revealed and here announced, which is respecting that class of persons only as they are, and must be, one portion of the faithful at the Lord's coming: not respecting the question, who shall, and who shall not be among them in that day. shall in no wise (emphatic—"there is no reason to fear, that we shall . . .") gain an advantage over (literally, get before, outstrip, anticipate: in the old sense of the word, prevent, so that they be left behind, and fail of the prize).

16.] A reason of the foregoing assertion, by detailing the method of the resurrection. Because the Lord Himself (said for solemnity's sake, and to shew that it will not be a mere gathering to Him, but HE HIMSELF will descend, and we all shall be summoned before Him) with (literally, 'in,' as the element,—the accompanying circumstance) a signal-shout (the word signifies primarily not only 'the shout of battle,' as Conybeare; but is used of any signal given by the voice, whether of a captain to his rowers, of a man shouting to another at a distance, of a huntsman to his dogs. Here it seems to include in it the two which follow and explain it), viz. with the voice of an (or, the) archangel (Christ shall be surrounded with His angels, Matt. xxv. 31 al. To enquire, which archangel, is futile: to understand the word of Christ Himself, or the Holy Spirit, impossible), and with the trump of God (the trumpet especially belonging to and used in the heavenly state of God; not, commanded by God [Pelt, Olsh., al.],—nor does of God import size or loudness [Bengel], although these qualities of course are understood. On the trumpet as summoning assemblies, compare Num. x. 2; xxxi. 6; Joel ii. 1:—as accompanying the divine appearances, Exod. xix. 16; Ps. xlvii. 5; Isa. xxvii. 13; Zech. ix. 14; Matt. xxiv. 31; 1 Cor. xv. 52) shall come down from heaven (see Acts i. 11): and the dead in Christ shall first rise (this first has no reference whatever to the first resurrection [Rev. xx. 5, 6], here, for only the Lord's people are here in question: but answers to then below: first, the dead in Christ shall rise: then, we, &c.): then we who are living, who remain behind (as above), shall be caught up (the great change spoken of, 1 Cor. xv. 52, having first suddenly taken place) all together (see Rom. iii. 12; ch. v. 10 note: together does not belong to "with them"), with them (the raised of ver. 16), in (the) clouds, to meet the Lord (as He descends. Christ is on His way to this earth: and when De Wette says that there is no plain trace in St. Paul of Christ's kingdom on earth,—and Lünemann, that the words shew that the Apostle did not think of Christ as descending down to the earth, surely they cannot suppose him to have been so ignorant of Old Test. prophecy, as to have allowed this, its plain testimony, to escape him. To meet occurs twice more in the New Test.: and each time implies meeting one who was approaching—not merely 'meeting with' a person), into the air (belongs to shall be caught up, not to the words "to meet the Lord," as in A. V.): and thus we (i. e. we and they united, who were the subject of the last sentence) shall be always with the Lord. That he advances no further in the prophetic description, but breaks off at our union in Christ's presence, is accounted for, by his purpose being accomplished, in having shewn that they who have died in Christ, shall not be thereby deprived of any advantage at His coming. The rest of the great events of that time—His advent on this earth, His judgment of it, assisted by His saints (1 Cor. vi. 2, 3),—His reign upon earth,—His final glorification with His redeemed in heaven,—are not treated here, but not therefore to be conceived of as alien from the Apostle's teaching. <sup>18.</sup> So then: seeing that this is so. these words, which I have by inspiration delivered to you. It will be manifest to the plain, as well as to the scholar-like reader, that attempts, like that of Mr. Jowett, to interpret such a passage as this by the rules of mere figurative language, are entirely beside the purpose. The Apostle's declarations here are made in the practical tone of strict matter of fact, and are given as literal details, to console men's minds under an existing difficulty. Never was a place where the analogy of symbolical apocalyptic language was less applicable. Either these details must be received by us as matter of practical expectation, or we must set aside the Apostle as one divinely empowered to teach the Church. It is a fair opportunity for a crucial experiment, to test Christian faith and unbelief: and such test cannot be evaded by Mr. Jowett's intermediate expedient of figurative language.

This is plain, by comparing 2 Thess. ii. 2; 1 Cor. i. 8; v. 5; 2 Cor. i. 14; Phil. i. 6, 10; ii. 16.—It is both the suddenness, and the terribleness of the Day's coming, which is here dwelt on: see next verse.

cometh upon them] The Greek word is generally used of any sudden unexpected appearance: as for example in Luke xxi. 34: Acts iv. 1.—It is pressing too close the comparison which follows, when De Wette says that it “assumes the day to be near,—for that such a woman, though she does not know the day and the hour, yet has a definite knowledge of the period,” for it is not the woman, nor her condition, that is the subject of comparison, but the unexpected pang of labour which comes on her.

4, 5.] But the Thessalonians, and Christians in general, are not to be thus overtaken by it.

4.] in darkness refers back to “in the night” above—in the ignorance and moral slumber of the world which knows not God. Not, ‘that day,’ but the DAY—the meaning of the day as distinguished from the darkness being brought out, and the day being put in the place of emphasis accordingly. That this is so, is plain from what follows, ver. 5.

5.] You (a) and all we Christians (b) have no reason to fear, and no excuse for being surprised by, the DAY of the Lord: for we are sons of light and the day (signifying that we belong to, having our origin from, the light and the day), and are not of (do not supply ‘sons’—the genitives signify possession—we belong not to) night nor darkness. and others, but literally. 8.] Contrast of our course, who are of the day. And this not only in being awake and sober, but in being armed—not only watchful, but as sentinels, on our guard, and guarded ourselves. Notice, that these arms are defensive only, as against a sudden attack—and belong therefore not so much to the Christian's conflict with evil, as (from the context) to his guard against being surprised by the day of the Lord as a thief in the night. The best defences against such a surprise are the three great Christian graces, Faith, Hope, Love,—which are accordingly here enumerated: see ch. i. 3, and 1 Cor. xiii. 13. In Eph. vi. 13—17, we have offensive as well as defensive weapons, and the symbolism is somewhat varied, the breastplate being righteousness, faith being the shield; while the helmet remains the same. See on the figure, Isa. lix. 17; Wisd. v. 17 ff. We must not perhaps press minutely the meaning of each part of the armour, in the presence of such variation in the two passages.

9.] Explanation of the "hope of salvation,"—"and we may with confidence put on such an hope as our helmet"—For God set us not ('appointed us not' [reff.]; keep the historical past meaning,—referring to the time when He made the appointment) to ('with a view to'—so as to issue in, become a prey to) wrath, but to acquisition of salvation through (through... refers to "acquisition of salvation," not to "appointed") our Lord Jesus Christ, <sup>10</sup> who died for us, that, whether we wake or sleep (in what sense? surely not in an ethical sense, as above: for they who sleep will be overtaken by Him as a thief, and His day will be to them darkness, not light. If not in an ethical sense, it must be in that of living or dying, and the sense as Rom. xiv. 8. For we cannot adopt the trifling sense given by Whitby, al.,—'whether He come in the night, and so find us taking our natural rest, or in the day when we are waking.' Thus understood however, it will be at the sacrifice of perspicuity, seeing that the words wake and sleep have been used ethically throughout the passage. If we wish to preserve the uniformity of metaphor, we may [though I am not satisfied with this] interpret in this sense: that our Lord died for us, that whether we watch [are of the number of the watchful, i. e. already Christians] or sleep [are of the number of the sleeping, i. e. unconverted] we should live, &c. Thus it would be equivalent to, 'who died that all men might be saved: who came, not to call the righteous only, but sinners to life. There is to this interpretation the great objection that it confounds with the "rest" the "we," who are definitely spoken of as set by God not to wrath but to the obtaining of salvation. So that the sense live or die, must, I think, be accepted, and the want of perspicuity with it). together: not to be joined to "with Him."

for their work's sake may mean, because of the nature of their work, viz. that it is the Lord's work, for your souls: or, on account of their activity in their office, as a recompense for their work. Both these motives are combined in Heb. xiii. 17. This exhortation, be at peace among yourselves, seems to be suggested by the foregoing, as enforcing peaceful and loving subordination without party strife: see the mention of the unruly below.

14—22.] General exhortations with regard to Christian duties. There appears no reason for regarding these verses as addressed to the presbyters, as some have done. They are for all: for each to interpret according to the sphere of his own duties. By the word brethren, he continues the same address as above.

14. disorderly] This, as ch. iv. 11, 2 Thess. iii. 6, 11, certainly implies that there was reason to complain of this disorder in the Thessalonian church. The original word is especially said of the soldier who does not remain in his rank: hence disorderly.

fainthearted] such e.g. as needed the comfort of ch. iv. 13 ff. support] literally, keep hold of. the weak must be understood of the spiritually weak, not the literally sick. 15.] This gives a slight warning that the practice might creep on them unawares. It is not addressed to any particular section of the church, but to all: to each for himself, and the church for each.

16.] Chrysostom refers this to ver. 15: "When we have such a disposition as to hurt no one but to do good to all, whence can the sting of grief enter? For he who so joys in being injured as to requite his injurer by good offices, whence shall he receive annoyance for the future?" But perhaps this is somewhat far-fetched. The connexion seems however to be justified as he proceeds: "And how, means the Apostle, is this possible? if we will, it is possible. And then he shews the way: 'pray unceasingly' &c." And so Theophylact: "For one accustomed to converse with God and to give thanks to Him for all that happens, as good for him, will clearly possess unbroken joy." 17.] See Chrysostom and Theophylact above. pray, not of the mere spirit of prayer, as Jowett:

<sup>19.</sup>] Chrysostom, &c. understand this ethically: that an unclean life quenches the Spirit within. But there can be no doubt that the supernatural agency of the Spirit is here alluded to,—the speaking in tongues, &c., as in 1 Cor. xii. 7 ff. It is conceived of as a flame, which may be checked and quenched: hence the “fervent (boiling) in the Spirit” of Acts xviii. 25; Rom. xii. 11.

<sup>20.</sup>] On prophesyings see 1 Cor. xii. 10, note. They were liable to be despised in comparison with the more evidently miraculous gift of tongues: and hence in 1 Cor. xiv. 5, &c. he takes pains to shew that prophecy was in reality the greater gift.

<sup>21.</sup>] This refers back to the foregoing: but try all (such spiritual gifts): see 1 Cor. xii. 10; xiv. 29; 1 John iv. 1.

hold fast that which is good is best regarded as beginning a new sentence, and opposed to that which follows: not however as disconnected from the preceding, but suggested by it. In this, and in all things, hold fast the good.

<sup>22.</sup>] These words cannot by any possibility be rendered as in A. V., ‘abstain from all appearance of evil.’ For (1) the Greek word (eidos) never signifies ‘appearance’ in this sense: (2) the two members of the sentence would thus not be logically correspondent, but a new idea would be introduced in the second which has no place in the context: for it is not against being deceived by false appearance, nor against giving occasion by behaviour which appears like evil, that he is cautioning them, but merely to distinguish and hold fast that which is good, and reject that which is evil. The Greek word means the species, as subordinated to the genus:—abstain from every species (or form) of evil.

<sup>23, 24.</sup>] But may the God of peace Himself—contrast to all these feeble endeavours on your own part.

spirit and soul and body] The SPIRIT (pneuma) is the highest and distinctive part of man, the immortal and responsible soul, in our common parlance: the SOUL is the lower or animal soul, containing the passions and desires which we have in common with the brutes, but which in us is ennobled and drawn up by the spirit. That St. Paul had these distinctions in mind, is plain from such places as 1 Cor. ii. 14. The spirit, that part whereby we are receptive of the Holy Spirit of God, is, in the unspiritual man, crushed down and subordinated to the animal soul (psyché): he therefore is called “a psychic man, not having a spirit,” Jude 19: see also note on 1 Cor. as above.

 account for it, not by supposing any dis-

a token or proof: manifested in you being called on and enabled to suffer for Christ, and your adversaries filling up the measure of their opposition to God. The just judgment is, that just judgment which will be completed at the Lord's coming, but is even now preparing—this being an earnest and token of it. that ye may be, &c.]

belongs to the implied assertion of the foregoing clause—‘which judgment is even now bringing about, &c.’—It is said not merely of the result, nor is it of the purpose of your endurance, as Estius characteristically explains it, to bring in the Romish doctrine of merit:—but of the purpose of God's dispensation of just judgment by which you will be ripened and fitted for His kingdom.

6.] If so be that (this refers back to the words just judgment above, and introduces a substantiation of this expression by an appeal to our ideas of strict justice) it is just with (in the esteem of) God to requite to those who trouble you tribulation (according to the strict rule of recompense), and to you who are troubled rest (literally relaxation: ‘the glory of the kingdom of God on its negative side, as liberation from earthly affliction.’ Lünemann) with us (viz. the writers, Paul, Silvanus, and Timothy, who are troubled like yourselves: not ‘with us [all] Christians,’ as some interpret it,—for all Christians were not afflicted, which is the condition of this rest in our sentence: still less, ‘with us Jews,’ you being Gentiles, as Bengel and others), at the revelation (manifestation in his appearing) of the Lord Jesus from heaven (compare 1 Thess. iv. 16) with the angels of His might (no hendiadys—not to be rendered as A. V., ‘his mighty angels,’ which, as usual, obscures and stultifies the sense: for the might of the angels is no element here, but His might, of which they are the angels—serving His power and proclaiming His might), in (the) fire of flame (so literally: further specification of the revelation above: does not belong to the following, as punctuated in A. V. On the analogy, see Exod. iii. 2; xix. 18; Dan. vii. 9, 10), bestowing (or, allotting: distributing as their portion) vengeance on them that know not God (the Gentiles), and on them (the demonstrative pronoun repeated indicates a new class of persons) that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus (the unbelieving Jews, see

It has been interpreted of time,—from the time of the appearing, &c.; but the words from the presence will not bear this) the presence (face) of the Lord, and from the glory of his Power (i. e. from the manifestation of his power in the glorification of his saints [see Isa. ii. 10, 19, 21]); when he shall [have] come to be glorified (by the great manifestation at His coming) in (they will be the element of His glorification: He will be glorified in them, just as the sun is reflected in a mirror) his saints (not angels, but holy men), and to be admired (wondered at) in (see above) all them that believed (past participle, looking back from that day on the past)—because our testimony to you (not "among you," as A. V.) was believed (parenthesis, serving to include the Thessalonians among them that believed)—in that day (the day of which we all know: this connects with what went before the parenthesis). We may observe, as against Jowett's view of the arguments here being merely "they suffer now; therefore their enemies will suffer hereafter: their enemies will suffer hereafter; therefore they will be comforted hereafter,"—that the arguments are nothing of the kind, resting entirely on the assertion that it is a righteous thing: thus bringing in all the relations of the Christian covenant, of them to God, and God to them,—and by contrast, of God to their enemies and persecutors.

CH. II. 1—12.] DOGMATICAL PORTION OF THE EPISTLE. Information (by way of correction) concerning the approach of the day of the Lord: its preventient and accompanying circumstances. 1.]

But (passing from those things which he prays for them, to those which he prays of them) we beseech you, brethren (to win their affectionate attention), in regard of (the A. V., and many ancient Commentators, render this preposition 'by,' and understand it as introducing a formula of adjuration. But this construction is not found in the New Test.; and it is most unnatural that the Apostle should thus conjure them by that concerning which he was about to teach them. It is best therefore to take it as above; with a slight tinge of the meaning "on behalf of:" for the subject had been misrepresented, and justice is done to it by the Apostle) the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our gathering together (i. e. the gathering together of us, announced in 1 Thess. iv. 17) to Him,

2.] [in order] that (aim of the request) ye should not be soon (lightly, and with small reason) shaken (properly of the waves agitated by a storm) from your mind (your mental apprehension of the subject:—not 'your former more correct sentiment,' as some interpret it), nor yet be troubled, neither by spirit (by means of spiritual gift of prophecy or the like, assumed to substantiate such a view), nor by word (of mouth: belongs closely to "nor by letter" following, as is shewn by ver. 15, where they again appear together) nor by letter, as by (agency of) us (pretending to be from us. Let no pretended saying, no pretended epistle of mine, shake you in this matter. That there were such, is shewn by this parallel position of the clauses with by spirit, which last agency certainly was among them. Sayings, and an epistle, to this effect, were ascribed to the Apostle. So Chrysostom: "He seems to me here to hint, that some were going about with a forged Epistle pretending to be from Paul, and that shewing this they affirmed the day of the Lord to be already come, that they might deceive many."—However improbable this may seem, our expression would seem hardly to bear legitimately any other meaning. Compare also ch. iii. 17, and note. It is impossible to understand the "Epistle as by us" of the first Epistle, wrongly understood, which certainly would have been more plainly expressed, and the Epistle would have been not, as here, disowned, but explained), to the effect that ('as if,' or 'as that') the day of the Lord is present (not, 'is at hand:' the verb here used occurs six times besides in the New Test., and always in the sense of being present; in two of those places, Rom. viii. 38, 1 Cor. iii. 22, the things present are distinguished expressly from the things to come. Besides which, we may without presumption say, St. Paul could not have so written, nor could the Spirit have so spoken by him. The teaching of the Apostles was, and of the Holy Spirit in all ages has been, that the day of the Lord is at hand. But these Thessalonians imagined it to be already come, and accordingly were deserting their pursuits in life, and falling into other irregularities, as if the day of grace were closed. So Chrysostom plainly, "The devil, when he could not persuade them that the announcements of things future were false, took another way, and having suborned certain pestilent fellows, endeavoured to deceive by persuading them that those great and glorious events had an end. At one time they said that the resurrection was already past: but in this case they

3.] Let no man deceive you in any manner (not only in either of the foregoing, but in any whatever): for (that day shall not come) (so A. V. supplies, rightly. There does not seem to have been any intention on the part of the Apostle to fill up the ellipsis: it supplies itself in the reader's mind), unless there have come the apostasy first (of which he had told them when present, see ver. 5: and probably with a further reference still to our Lord's prophecy in Matt. xxiv. 10—12), and there have been revealed (ch. i. 7. As Christ in His time, so Antichrist in his time, is 'revealed'—brought out into light: he too is a mystery to be unfolded and displayed: see vv. 8, 9) the Man of Sin (in whom sin is as it were personified, as righteousness in Christ. The genitive, of sin, is called by Ellicott that of the predominating quality. Notice the variety,—of lawlessness, which is the term used below, vv. 7, 8), the son of perdition (see John xvii. 12, where our Lord uses the expression of Judas. It seems merely to refer to Antichrist himself, whose essence and inheritance is perdition,—not to his influence over others); he that withstandeth (the expression is absolute, 'he that withstands CHRIST,' the anti-christ, 1 John ii. 18), and exalteth himself above (in a hostile sense) every one that is called God (compare a similar expression, 1 Cor. viii. 5. "The expression includes the true God, as well as the false ones of the heathen—but that is called is a natural addition from Christian caution, as 'every God' would have been a senseless and indeed blasphemous expression for a Christian." Lünemann), or an object of adoration (compare the close parallel in Dan. xi. 36, 37. Notice, that the meaning of these words cannot by any probability be fulfilled by any one who, as the Pope, creates objects of worship, and thus (by inference merely) makes himself greater than the objects which he creates: but it is required that this Antichrist should set HIMSELF up as an object of worship, above, and as superior to, "every one that is called God or worshipped"); so that he sits in (enters into, sets himself down in, and remains in) the temple of God (this, say some Commentators, cannot be any other than the temple at Jerusalem: on account of the definiteness of the expression, sits in the temple of God. But there is no force in this. The temple of God is used metaphorically by St. Paul in 1 Cor. iii. 17: and why not here? see also 1 Cor. vi. 16; Eph. ii. 21. From these passages it is plain that such figurative sense was familiar to the Apostle. And if so, the sitting makes no difficulty. Its figurative sense, as holding a place of power, sitting as judge or ruler, is more frequent still: see in St. Paul, 1 Cor. vi. 4: and Matt. xxiii. 2: Rev. xx. 4: to which indeed we might add the many places where our Lord is said to sit on the right hand of God, e. g. Heb. i. 3; viii. 1; x. 12; xii. 2; Rev. iii. 21. Respecting the interpretation, see Introduction, § v.), shewing himself (not merely attempting to shew himself, but the words import that it is his habit and office to exhibit himself as God) that he is God (not 'a god,' but the word designates the divine dignity which he predicates of himself. I keep in my rendering in the notes to the literal force of the original) the MYSTERY (as opposed to the revelation of the man of sin) ALREADY (as opposed to "in his own time" above) is working (not "is being wrought," I retain the inversion of the words, to mark better the primary and secondary emphasis: see below) of lawlessness (i. e. ungodliness—refusal to recognize God's law—see refl.) The genitive is one of apposition: the lawlessness is that wherein the mystery consists), only until he that now hindereth be removed (the phrase is used of any person or thing which is taken out of the way, whether by death or other removal).

8.] And then (when he that hinders shall have been removed: the emphasis is on this word) shall be revealed the Lawless One (the same as the he of ver. 6: viz. the "man of sin"), whom (by this relative clause is introduced his ultimate fate at the coming of the Lord. To this the Apostle is carried on by the fervency of

It is better to keep the expression in its simple majesty, than to interpret it, as Theodoret, "that the Lord has but to speak, and shall deliver the wicked one to utter destruction"), and annihilate (not, as Olshausen, "deprive of his influence," nor can Rev. xix. 19 be brought to bear here) by the appearance of His coming (not "the brightness of his coming," as very many Commentators, and A. Compare the sublime expression of Milton,—"far off His coming shone");

<sup>13</sup> But as for us, <sup>u</sup> we are bound to give thanks to God alway for you, brethren beloved of the Lord, because God <sup>x</sup> chose you <sup>y</sup> from the beginning to salvation <sup>z</sup> in sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth:

ceivableness,' for it is the agency of the man of sin—active deceit, of which the word is used) of unrighteousness (belonging to, consisting in, leading to, unrighteousness) for (tending to the destruction of) those who are perishing (on their way to perdition. WHY? not by God's absolute decree, but); because (in requital for this, that) they did not (when it was offered to them) receive the love of the truth (the opposite of the falsehood which characterizes all the working of the man of sin: see as before, John viii. 44) in order to their being saved. <sup>11.</sup> And on this account (because they did not receive, &c.) God is sending to them (not as A. V., 'shall send': the verb is present, because the mystery of iniquity is already working. God's sending must not for a moment be understood of permissiveness only on God's part—He is the judicial sender and doer—it is He who hardens the heart which has chosen the evil way. All such distinctions are the merest folly: whatever God permits, he ordains) the working of delusion (is causing these seducing influences to work among them. The A. V. has weakened, indeed almost stultified the sentence, by rendering these words 'a strong delusion,' i.e. the passive state resulting, instead of the active cause), in order that they should believe the falsehood (which the mystery of sin is working among them): that (the higher or ultimate purpose of God) all might be judged (i.e.

here 'condemned,' by the context) who did not (looking back over their time of probation) believe the truth, but found pleasure in iniquity. I have above given the rendering of this important passage. For the history and criticism of its interpretation, see the Introduction, § v.

This is the divine side of the element: the human side follows,—'your own reception, by faith, of the truth.' 14] to which (i. e. the being saved in sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth) He (God) called you through our Gospel (our preaching of the Gospel to you), in order to (your) acquisition (see on 1 Thess. v. 9) of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ (i. e. your sharing in the glory which He has; see John xvii. 22; Rom. viii. 17, 29).

15.] Therefore—seeing that such is God's intent respecting you. Mr. Jowett here describes the Apostle as being "unconscious of the logical inconsistency" of appealing to them to do any thing, after he has just stated their election of God. Rather we should say, that he was deeply conscious, as ever, of the logical necessity of the only practical inference which man can draw from God's gracious purposes to him. No human reasoning powers can connect the two,—God's sovereignty and man's free will: all we know of them is, that the one is as certain a truth as the other. In proportion then as we assert the one strongly, we must ever implicate the other as strongly: a course which the great Apostle never fails to pursue: see Phil ii. 12, 13, al. freq. stand fast is a contrast to "being shaken," ver. 2. our epistle, as contrasted with the "epistle as from us" of ver. 2, refers to 1 Thess.

the Lord is then glorified, when it becomes the power of God to salvation to the believer—see Rom. i. 16. even as it is also with you] for they had thus received it: 1 Thess. i. 6. 2.] And in order for that to be the case,—that we may be free to preach it. The word rendered perverse is properly used of that which is not in its right place. When of persons, it designates one who does or says that which is inappropriate under the circumstances. But as some other words which had originally a milder meaning, it has come to mean one who sets himself against divine or human laws. Perhaps “perverse” is our nearest word to it. Who are these men? It is obvious that the key to the answer will be found in Acts xviii. They were the Jews at Corinth, who were at that time the especial adversaries of the Apostle and his preaching. And this is confirmed by the clause which he has added to account for their perversity and wickedness.

for to all men the (Christian) faith does not belong—all men do not receive it—have no receptivity for it—obviously pointing at Jews by this description. 3.] Calvin says,

“These words shew that Paul was anxious for others, rather than for himself. Against him malignant men directed all the stings of their wickedness, against him all their attacks were made: but he directs all his care towards his Thessalonians, lest any temptation should beset them.” But, in contrast with the men just mentioned, the Lord is Christ: see ch. ii. 16, and ver. 5. shall establish you] in reference to his wish, ch. ii. 17. evil may also be rendered ‘the evil one,’ as in

Matt. xiii. 19: Eph. vi. 16. But here the assurance seems, as before said, to correspond to the wish ch. ii. 17: in which case evil is neuter. We may observe that the words are nearly a citation from the Lord’s prayer. 4.] forms a transition to the exhortations which are to follow ver. 6 ff. in the Lord, as the element in which his confidence is exercised, shews it to be one assuming that they will act consistently with their Christian profession: and so gives the expectation the force of an exhortation, but at the same time of a hopeful exhortation. 5.] There does not appear to be any distrust of the Thessalonians implied by this repeated wish for them, as De Wette supposes. Rather is it an enlargement, taken up by the but (not only so, but), of the assurance just expressed. the Lord—Christ, as before.

the love of God here, from the fact of his wishing that their hearts may be directed into it, must be subjective, the love of man to God. the patience of Christ has very generally been understood, as in A. V., ‘the patient waiting for Christ.’ But the substantive will not bear this meaning. It occurs thirty-four times in the New Test., and always in the sense of endurance,—patience. Nor again can the expression mean ‘endurance for Christ’s sake,’ which the simple genitive will not convey: but it must be, as Chrysostom says, “that we may endure as He endured:” the patience of Christ (genitive possessive),—which Christ shewed.

6—15.] Dehortation from disorderly, idle habits of life. He had given a hint in this direction before, in the first Epistle (v. 14, 15): he now speaks more plainly

13.] But ye—who are free from this fault. well doing, from the context, cannot mean ‘doing good’ (to others), but doing well, living diligently and uprightly: see also Gal. vi. 9, where the same general sentiment occurs.

14. mark] The ordinary meaning of the word: put a mark on him, by noticing him for the sake of avoidance.

15.] And is more delicate than “yet” or “but” would be: ‘and I know that it will follow as a consequence of your being Christians, that ye will, &c.’ as in the first clause seems superfluous: it is perhaps inserted to correspond with the other clause, or still further to soften the counting him an enemy.

16.] Concluding wish. On the Lord Himself, see on ch. ii. 16. the Lord of peace] As the Apostle constantly uses also the expression, “the God of Peace” (see Rom. xv. 33; xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xiii. 11, al.), we here must understand our Lord Jesus Christ. peace must not be understood only of peace with one another: for there has been no special mention of mutual disagreement in this Epistle: but of peace in general, outward and inward, here and hereafter, as in Rom. xiv.

17. The stress is on you—May the Lord of Peace give you (that) Peace always in every way (whether it be outward or inward, for time or for eternity). with you all] Therefore with those who walked disorderly also. The man who was to be admonished as a brother, would hardly be excluded from the Apostle’s parting blessing.

17, 18.] CONCLUSION. 17.] Autographic salutation. The Epistle, as it follows from this, was not written with the Apostle’s own hand, but dictated. So with other Epistles: see Rom. xvi. 22: 1 Cor. xvi. 21: Col. iv. 18. The whole of vv. 17, 18, not merely the benediction, are included in the term the salutation, as written by his own hand. By the words so I write, we must not conceive that any thing was added, such as his signature,—or “farewell,” or any thing of the kind: they are said of that which he is writing at the time. His reason for this caution evidently was, the “epistle as from us,” spoken of ch. ii. 2. And the words in every epistle must not be limited to any future Epistles which he might send to the Thessalonians, but understood of a caution which he intended to practise in future with all his Epistles: or at least with such as required, from circumstances, this identification. Thus we have (1 Thess. being manifestly an exception, as written before the rule was established) Gal. written with his own hand (see note on Gal. vi. 11); 1 Cor. authenticated (xvi. 21); 2 Cor. sent by Titus, and therefore perhaps

CHAP. I. 1, 2.] ADDRESS AND GREETING.

1. according to the commandment] See Rom. xvi. 26, Tit. i. 3: a usual expression of St. Paul, and remarkably enough occurring in the doxology at the end of the Epistle to the Romans, which there is every reason to think was written long after the Epistle itself. It is a more direct predication of divine command than "by the will of God" in the earlier Epistles.

and Christ Jesus] The Apostle loves these repetitions in his more solemn and formal passages—and the whole style of these Epistles partakes more of this character, as was natural in the decline of life.

our hope] It is not easy to point out the exact reference of this word here, any further than we may say that it gives utterance to the fulness of an old man's heart in the near prospect of that on which it naturally was ever dwelling. It is the ripening and familiarization of "Christ in us the hope of glory," Col. i. 27. See also Tit. i. 2. I am persuaded that in many such expressions in these Epistles, we are to seek rather a psychological than a pragmatical explanation. Theodoret notices the similar occurrence of words in Ps. lxx.

5, "O God our Saviour, who art the hope of all the ends of the earth"—which is interesting, as it might have suggested the expression here, familiar as the Apostle was with Old Test. diction.

2. my true child] my genuine offspring, begotten by me unto the faith of Christ. Compare Acts xvi. 1: 1 Cor. iv. 14—17; and see Introd. to this Epistle, § i. 1 ff.

mercy and peace are found joined in Gal. vi. 16, in which Epistle are so many similarities to these (see Introd. to these Epistles, § i. 32, note).—The expression God the Father, absolute, is found in St. Paul, in Gal. i. 1, 3: Eph. vi. 23: Phil. ii. 11: Col. iii. 17: 1 Thess. i. 1: (2 Thess i. 2, various reading:) 2 Tim. i. 2: Tit. i. 4. So that it belongs to all periods of his writing, but chiefly to the later.

Thence he returns to his

3.] The sentence begins As I exhorted thee, &c., but in his negligence of writing, the Apostle does not finish the construction: neither verse 5, nor 12, nor 18, will form the conclusion to it without unnatural forcing. besought thee]

Chrysostom lays stress on the word, as implying great mildness—"Listen to his kind consideration, how he does not make use of the force of a master, but rather of a servant: he says not 'I enjoined,' nor 'I commanded,' nor 'I recommended,' but 'I besought thee.'" See the whole subject discussed in the Introd. ch. vii. § ii.

some] so constantly in these Epistles, see vv. 6, 19; ch. iv. 1; v. 15; vi. 10, 21; 2 Tim. ii. 18: sometimes the gainsayers, Tit. i. 9, or many, ib. 10. Huther infers from this word that the number at this time was not considerable: but this is hardly safe. "The indefinite pronoun is more probably slightly contemptuous: see Jude 4, and Gal. ii. 12." Ellicott.

4. fables] We can only judge from the other passages in these Epistles where the word occurs, what kind of fables are alluded to. In Tit. i. 14 we have "Jewish fables." In our ch. iv. 7, they are designated as "profane and anile." In 2 Tim. iv. 4, they are spoken of absolutely, as here. If we are justified in identifying the 'fables' in Titus with these, they had a Jewish origin: but merely to take them, as Theodoret, for the Jewish traditional comments on the law, does not seem to satisfy the epithets quoted above. And consequently others have interpreted them of the gnostic mythology. It does not seem easy to define them any further, but it is plain that any transitional state from Judaism to gnosticism will satisfy the conditions here propounded without inferring that the full-blown gnosticism of the second century must be meant, and thus calling in question the genuineness of the Epistle. On the whole subject, see Introd. to ch. vii. § i. 8 ff.

endless genealogies] De Wette, in his note on Tit. i. 14, marks out well the references which have been assigned to this expression:

"genealogies cannot mean 1) properly genealogical registers,—either for a pure genealogico-historical end, or for a dogmatico-historical one, to foster the religious national pride of Jews against Gentiles, see Phil. iii. 4 f., or to ascertain the descent of the Messiah, least of all genealogies of Timothy himself,—for all this does not touch, or too little touches religious interests: nor are they 2) gentile theogonies; nor again 3) cabalistic pedigrees, which will hardly suit the word genealogies: nor 4) Essenean genealogies of angels, of the existence of which we have no proof: nor 5) allegorizing genealogies, applications of psychological and historical considerations to the genealogies contained in the books of Moses: as in Philo,—a practice too peculiar to Philo and his view: but most probably 6) lists of gnostic emanations."—But again, inasmuch as genealogies are coupled in Tit. iii. 9 with "strifes about the law," it seems as if we must hardly understand the ripened fruits of gnosticism, but rather the first beginnings of those genealogies in the abuse of Judaism.

the which] i. e. of the kind which. minister] 'afford,' 'give rise to,' 'furnish.'

rather than] is a mild way of saying "and not:" see John iii. 19; Acts xxvii. 11; 2 Tim. iii. 4.

God's dispensation . . .] This has been taken two ways: 1) objectively: the dispensation of God (towards man) which is (consists) in (the) faith: in which case the verb “minister” must bear something of a transferred meaning, as applied to “dispensation,” implying, “rather than they set forth,” &c. And to this there can be no objection. This meaning also suits that of dispensation, even in Eph. i. 16, and 1 Cor. ix. 17, where the dispensation is the objective matter wherewith the Apostle was entrusted, not his own subjective fulfilment of it. 2) subjectively:—“the exercising of the stewardship of God in faith.” But to this there is the serious objection, that the word economy, or dispensation, in this subjective sense, “the fulfilment of the duty of a steward,” wants example: and even could this be substantiated, to minister a dispensation, in the sense required, would seem again questionable. I would therefore rest in the objective sense—the dispensation of God. Then which is in faith has also been variously taken. But the only legitimate meaning seems to be—which is in faith, i. e. finds its sphere, and element, and development among men, in faith. Thus in faith stands in contrast to questions, in which the dispensation of God does not consist: and the way for the next sentence is prepared, which speaks of faith unfeigned as one of the means to the great end of the gospel.

5.] But (contrast to the practice of these pretended teachers of the law) the end (purpose, aim) of the commandment (viz. of the law of God in [ver. 11] the gospel: not, although in the word there may be a slight allusion to it,—of that which Timothy was to command, ver. 3. This commandment is understood from the dispensation just mentioned, of which it forms a part) is Love (as Rom. xiii. 10. We recognize, in the re-stating of former axiomatic positions, without immediate reference to the subject in hand, the characteristic of a later style of the Apostle) out of (arising, springing from, as its place of birth—the heart being the central point of life: see especially ref. 1 Pet.) a pure heart (pure from all selfish views and leanings: see Acts xv. 9) and good conscience (is this good conscience, 1) a conscience good by being freed from guilt by the application of Christ's blood,—or is it 2) a conscience pure in motive antecedent to the act of love? This must be decided by the usage of this and similar expressions in these Epistles, where they occur several times [1 Tim. iii. 9; 2 Tim. i. 3; 1 Tim. iv. 2; Tit. i. 15]. From those examples it would appear that in the language of the pastoral Epistles a good conscience is joined with soundness in the faith, a bad conscience with unsoundness. So that we can hardly help introducing the element of freedom from guilt by the effect of that faith on the conscience. And the earlier usage of St. Paul in Acts xxiii. 1, compared with the very similar one in 2 Tim. i. 3, goes to substantiate this) and faith unfeigned (this connects with “which is in faith,” above: it is faith, not the pretence of faith, the mere apparent faith of the hypocrite, which, as in Acts xv. 9, “purifieth the hearts,” and as in Gal. v. 6, “worketh by love.” Wiesinger well remarks that we see from this, that the general character of these false teachers, as of those against whom Titus is warned, was not so much error in doctrine, as leading men away from the earnestness of the loving Christian life, to useless and vain questionings, ministering only strife): 6.] (the connexion is—it was by declining from these qualities that these men entered on their paths of error) from which things (the pure heart, good conscience, and faith unfeigned—the sources of love, which last they have therefore missed by losing them) some having swerved (‘missed their mark:’ but this seems hardly precise enough: it is not so much to miss a thing at which a man is aiming, as to leave unregarded one at which he ought to be aiming) have been turned aside unto (away from the path leading to the end, ver. 5, in which they should have been walking) vain babbling (of what kind, is explained ver. 7, and Tit. iii. 9, which place connects this expression with our ver. 4. It is the vain questions arising out of the law, which he thus characterizes); wishing to be (giving themselves out as, without really being) teachers of the law (of what law? and in what sense? To the former question, but one answer can be given. The law is that of Moses; the law, always so known. The usage of the term, teacher of the law, forbids our giving the word, as coming from a Jew, any other meaning. That this is so, is also borne out by Tit. i. 14. We may see clearly by the data furnished in these pastoral Epistles, that the Apostle had in them to deal with men who corrupted the material enactments of the moral law, and founded on Judaism not assertions of its obligation, but idle fables and allegories, letting in latitude of morals, and unholiness of life. It is against this abuse of the law that his arguments are directed: no formal question arises of the obligation of the law: these men struck, by their interpretation, at the root of all divine law itself, and therefore at that root itself does he meet and grapple with them. [See more in the Introd.] Hence the following description), though they understand neither the things which they say (the actual diatribes which they themselves put forth, they do not understand: they are not honest men, speaking from conviction, and therefore lucidly: but men depraved in conscience [Tit. i. 14, 15], and putting forth things obscure to themselves, for other and selfish purposes), nor concerning what things they make affirmation (nor those objective truths which properly belong to and underlie the matters with which they are thus tampering). <sup>8 ff.]</sup> On the other hand the law has its right use:—not that to which they put it, but to testify against sins in practice: the catalogue of which seems to be here introduced, on account of the lax moral practice of these very men who were, or were in danger of, falling into them. They did not set it aside, but perverted it, and practised the very sins against which it was directed. But (slight contrast to last verse, taking up the matter on general grounds) we know (see Rom. vii. 14: a thoroughly Pauline expression) that the law is good (Rom. vii. 16: not only profitable, but in a far higher sense, as in Rom. vii. 12, 14: good abstractedly,—in accordance with the divine holiness and justice and truth: see ver. 18, ch. iv. 4), if a man (undoubtedly, in the first place, and mainly, a teacher: but not to be confined to that meaning: all that is here said might apply just as well to a private Christian's thoughts and use of the law, as to the use of it by teachers themselves) use it lawfully (i. e. not, as most expositors, according to its intention as law, and as directed against the following sins in Christians: but clearly, from what follows, lawfully in the Gospel sense: i. e. as not binding on, nor relevant to Christian believers, but only a means of awakening repentance in the ungodly and profane. Chrysostom's words are: "Who is he that uses it lawfully? He who knows not the need of it"), and be aware of this (the word implies both the possession and the application of the knowledge), that for a righteous man (in what sense? in the mere sense of 'virtuous,' righteous in the world's acceptance of the term? Such meaning is clearly excluded by ver. 11, which sets the whole sentence in the full light of Gospel doctrine, and necessitates a corresponding interpretation for every term used in it. Righteous therefore can only mean, righteous in the Christian sense, viz. by justifying faith and sanctification of the Spirit,—one who is included in the actual righteousness of Christ by having put Him on, and so not forensically amenable to the law,—partaker of the inherent righteousness of Christ, inwrought by the Spirit, which unites him to Him, and so not morally needing it) the law (as before) is not enacted but for lawless and insubordinate (Tit. i. 6, 10: it is very nearly the same as disobedient, see Tit. i. 16; iii. 3,—this latter being more subjective, whereas "in-

This first pair of adjectives expresses opposition to the law, and so stands foremost as designating those for whom it is enacted), for impious and sinful (see especially 1 Pet. iv. 18. This second pair expresses opposition to God, whose law it is—impious, or ungodly, being the man who does not reverence Him, the sinner, the man who lives in defiance of Him), for unholy and profane (this last pair betokens separation and alienation from God and His law alike—those who have no share in His holiness, no relation to things sacred. "The impious is unholy through his lack of reverence: the unholy, through his lack of inner purity." Ellicott), for father-smiters and mother-smiters (not only murderers; the word often had a wider sense. Hitherto the classes have been general, and [see above] arranged according to their opposition to the law, or to God, or to both: now he takes the second table of the decalogue, and goes through its commandments, to the ninth inclusive, in order. Smiters of fathers and mothers are the transgressors of the fifth), for manslayers (the sixth), for fornicators, for sodomites (sins of abomination against both sexes: the seventh), for slave-dealers (the Apostle puts the slave-stealer and dealer as the most flagrant of all breakers of the eighth commandment. No theft of a man's goods can be compared with that most atrocious act, which steals the man himself, and robs him of that free will which is the first gift of his Creator. And of this crime all are guilty, who, whether directly or indirectly, are engaged in, or uphold from whatever pretence, the making or keeping of slaves), for liars, for perjurers (breakers of the ninth commandment. It is remarkable that he does not refer to that very commandment by which the law wrought on himself when he was alive without the law and sin was dead in him, viz. the tenth. Possibly this may be on account of its more spiritual nature, as he here wishes to bring out the grosser kinds of sin against which the moral law is pointedly enacted. The subsequent clause however seems as if he had it in his mind, and on that account added a concluding general and inclusive description), and if any thing else (he passes to sins themselves from the committers of sins) is opposed to the healthy teaching (i.e. that moral teaching which is spiritually sound: the teaching according to godliness, ch. vi. 3, where it is parallel with "the wholesome sayings of our Lord Jesus Christ." "The formula . . . stands in clear and suggestive contrast to the sickly [ch. vi. 4] and morbid [2 Tim. ii. 17] teaching of Jewish gnosis." V., see 2 Cor. iv. 4: all propriety and beauty of expression is here, as always, destroyed by this adjectival rendering. The gospel is 'the glad tidings of the glory of God,' as of Christ in 2 Cor., inasmuch as it reveals to us God in all His glory, which glory would be here that of justifying the sinner without the law, by His marvellous provision of redemption in Christ) of the blessed God (blessed, used of God, is one of those expressions which are peculiar to this later date and manner of the Apostle. was (indicating simply the past; pointing to the time during which this his commission had been growing into its fulness and importance) entrusted (not these people). The connexion with the following appears to be this: his mind is full of thankfulness at the thought of the commission which was thus entrusted to him: he does not regret the charge, but overflows with gratitude at the remembrance of Christ's grace to him, especially when he recollects also what he once was; how nearly approaching [for I would not exclude even that thought as having contributed to produce these strong expressions] some of those whom he has just mentioned. So that he now goes off from the immediate subject, even more completely and suddenly than is his wont in his other writings, as again and again in these pastoral Epistles: shewing thereby, I believe, the tokens of advancing age, and of that faster hold of individual habits of thought and mannerisms, which characterizes the decline of life).

12 ff.] (See summary on ver. 3.) I give thanks (this peculiar expression is only used by the Apostle here and in 2 Tim. i. 3) to Him that put strength in me (viz. for His work: he is here treating of the divine enlightening and strengthening which he received for the ministry: compare Acts ix. 22, where the same word in the Greek occurs, "Saul increased in strength"—a coincidence not to be overlooked), [even] Christ Jesus our Lord, that He accounted me faithful (compare the strikingly similar expression, 1 Cor. vii. 25, "I give my opinion, as having received mercy from the Lord to be faithful."—He knew me to be such an one, in His foresight, as would prove faithful to the great trust), appointing me (compare 1 Thess. v. 9. The expression is there used of that appointment of God in His sovereignty, by which our course is marked for a certain aim or end: and so it is best taken here,—not for the act of 'putting me into,' the ministry, as A. V.) to the ministry (what sort of ministry, is declared, Acts xx. 24); <sup>13</sup> (and all the more is he thankful, seeing that he was once a direct opponent of the Gospel), being before (the participle is slightly concessive, though I was before) a blasphemer (see Acts xxvi. 9, 11), and persecutor, and insulter (one who added insult to persecution. The facts which justified the use of such a term were known to St. Paul's conscience: we might well infer them, from his own confessions in Acts xxii. 4, 19, and xxvi. 9—12. He describes himself as "being exceedingly mad against them"); howbeit ("God's mercy and St. Paul's want of it are put in sharp contrast." Ellicott) I had mercy shewn me, because I did it ignorantly (so Rom. x. 2, of the Jews, "They have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge." Compare also, as a most important parallel, our Lord's prayer for His murderers, Luke xxiii. 34) in unbelief (unbelief was his state, of which his ignorance of what he did was a consequence. The clause is a very weighty one, as applying to others under similar circumstances: and should lead us to form our judgments in all charity respecting even persecutors—and if of them, then surely even with a wider extension of charity to those generally, who lie in the ignorance of unbelief, whatever be its cause, or its effects). <sup>14</sup> But (contrast still to his former state, and explanatory of his having found mercy) the grace of our Lord (His mercy shewn to me—but not in strengthening me for His work, endowing me with spiritual gifts, &c., as Chrysostom and others, for the mercy shewn to him is the ruling idea through the whole, and he recurs to it again ver. 16, never having risen above it to that of his higher gifts) superabounded

This is much better than to regard with faith and love as giving that wherein the grace superabounded). <sup>15.</sup> Faithful (worthy of credit: compare Rev. xxi. 5, "These sayings are true and faithful:" similarly xxii. 6. The formula "Faithful is the saying" is peculiar to the pastoral Epistles, and characteristic I believe of their later age, when certain sayings had taken their place as Christian axioms, and were thus designated) is the saying, and worthy of all (all possible i. e. universal) reception (we have a form of the same word used Acts ii. 46, "As many as received his word were baptized"), that Christ Jesus came into the world (an expression otherwise found only in St. John. In Matt. xviii. 11, and the parallel place in St. Luke, we have came, simply, thus used) to save sinners (to be taken in the most general sense, not limited in any way); of whom (sinners; the aim and extent of the Lord's mercy intensifies the feeling of his own especial unworthiness) I am (not, 'was') chief (literally, first: but the expression does not refer to time, which would not be the fact [see below]: the expression is one of the deepest humility: "he oversteps the very limit of self-abasement," says Theodoret: and indeed it is so, compare Phil. iii. 6; 1 Cor. xv. 9; Acts xxiii. 1; xxiv. 16; but deep humility ever does this: it is but another form of "me the sinner," Luke xviii. 13: other men's crimes seem to sink into nothing in comparison, and a man's own to be the chief and only ones in his sight).

<sup>16.</sup> Howbeit (as A. V.: "not resumptive, but as in ver. 13, seclusive and antithetical, marking the contrast between the Apostle's own judgment on himself, and the mercy which God was pleased to shew him." Ellicott) for this purpose I had mercy shewn me, that in me (as an example; "in my case:" compare what follows—"for a pattern, &c.") first (it can hardly be denied that in this same word here the senses of 'chief' and 'first' are combined. Though he was not in time 'the first of sinners,' yet he was the first as well as the most notable example of such marked longsuffering, held up for the encouragement of the church) Christ Jesus might shew forth the whole of His ('the whole,' 'the whole mass of His longsuffering, of which I was an example') longsuffering (Christ's mercy gave him all that time for repentance, during which he was persecuting and opposing Him,—and therefore it was his longsuffering which was so wonderful), for an example (literally, a sketch, an outline, afterwards to be filled up. This indeed the recorded history of Paul would be,—the filling up taking place in each man's own case: see 2 Tim. i. 13, note) of (i. e. to, or for: their examples for their use) those who should (the time of the future pointed at is not the time of writing the Epistles, but that of the mercy being shewn: so that we must not say "who shall," but "who should") believe on Him (to belongs to believe [see above] as its aim and end [compare Heb. x. 39]) eternal life. <sup>17.</sup> But (this disjunctive particle takes the thought entirely off from himself and every thing else, and makes the following sentence exclusive as applied to God. Compare by all means the very similar doxology, Rom xvi. 25 ff.: and see, on their similarity, the inferences in the Introduction, § i. 33, and note) to the King (this name, as applied to God, is found, in the New Test., only in Matt. v. 35 [not xxv. 33 ff.] and our ch. vi. 15. See below) of the ages (i.e. of eternity. In Ps. cxlv. 13 we have (see margin of A. V.) "My kingdom is a kingdom of all ages:" in Tobit xiii. 6, 10, God is called in the original, 'the King of the ages:' and in Eccles. xxxvi. 17, 'the God of the ages.' Comparing these with the well-known expression, to the ages of the ages (see below), and the like, it is far more likely that the ages here should mean eternity, than the ages of this world, as many have understood it. The doxology is to the Father, not to the Trinity, nor to the Son), the incorruptible (in Rom. xvi. 27 only used of God), invisible (see ch. vi. 16: John i. 18), only God (the word wise has apparently come from the doxology at the end of Romans, where it is most appropriate), be honour and glory to the ages of the ages (the periods which are made up of ages, as these last are of years,—as years are of days: see note, Eph. iii. 21). Amen.

18 ff.] He now returns to the matter which he dropped in ver. 3, not indeed formally, so as to supply the termination of the sentence there neglected, but virtually: the commandment not being the one there hinted at, for that was one not given to Timothy, but to be given by him. Nor is it that in ver. 5, for that is introduced as regarding a matter quite different from the present—viz. the aberrations of the false teachers, who do not here appear till the exhortation to Timothy is over. What this command is, is plain from the following.—This command I commit (as a deposit, to be faithfully guarded and kept) unto thee, my child Timothy (see on ver. 2), according to (in pursuance of) the former prophecies concerning thee (the directions, or, prophecies properly so called, of the Holy Spirit, which were spoken concerning Timothy at his first conversion, or at his admission [compare ch. iv. 14] into the ministry, by the "prophets" in the church. We have instances of such prophetic intimations in Acts xiii. 1, 2,—[xi. 28,]—xxi. 10, 11. By such intimations, spoken perhaps by Silas, who was with him, and who was a prophet [Acts xv. 32], may St. Paul have been first induced to take Timothy to him as a companion, Acts xvi. 3), that thou mayest (purpose, and at the same time purport, of the commandment) war (this word extends to the whole business of the employed soldier; not indicating merely fighting, properly so called) in them (not, as A. V., 'by them,' but 'in,' as clad with them, as if they were his defence and confirmation) the good warfare (not as Conybeare, 'fight the good fight.' It is the whole campaign, not the fight alone, which is here spoken of); holding [fast] (more than 'having,' but we must hardly carry on the metaphor and think of the shield of faith Eph. vi. 16, such continuation being rendered unlikely by the unmetaphorical character of the following words, a good conscience) faith, and good conscience (compare ver. 5),—which (latter, viz. good conscience—not, both) some having thrust from them (there is something in the word implying the violence of the act required, and the importunity of conscience, reluctant to be so extruded) made shipwreck (the similitude is so common a one, that it is hardly necessary to extend the figure of a shipwreck beyond the word itself, nor to find in the thrusting from them allusion to a rudder, anchor, &c.) concerning the faith (objective: the things believed): among whom is Hymenæus (there is a Hymenæus mentioned 2 Tim. ii. 17, in conjunction with Philetus, as an heretical teacher. There is no reason to distinguish him from this one: nor any difficulty occasioned by the fact of his being here delivered over to Satan, and there mentioned as overthrowing the faith of many. He would probably go on with his evil teaching in spite of the Apostle's sentence, which could carry weight with those only who were sound in the faith) and Alexander (in all probability identical with "Alexander the coppersmith," 2 Tim. iv. 14. There is nothing against it in what is there said of him. He appears there to have been an adversary of the Apostle, who had withstood and injured him at his late visit to Ephesus: but there is no reason why he should not have been still under this sentence at that time); whom I delivered over to Satan (there does not seem to be, as almost always taken for granted, any necessary assertion of excommunication, properly so called. The delivering to Satan, as in 1 Cor. v. 5, seems to have been an apostolic act, for the purpose of active punishment, in order to correction. It might or might not be accompanied by extrusion from the church: it appears to have been thus accompanied in 1 Cor. v. 5:—but the two must not be supposed identical. The upholders of such identity allege the fact of Satan's empire being conceived as including all outside the church [Acts xxvi. 18 al.]; but such expressions are too vague to be adduced as applying to a direct assertion like this. Satan, the adversary, is evidently regarded as the buffetor and tormentor, compare 2 Cor. xii. 7—ever ready, unless his hand were held, to distress and afflict God's people,—and ready therefore, when thus let loose by one having power over him, to execute punishment with all his malignity. —Observe that the verb is not perfect, "I have delivered," as A. V. wrongly, but past [I delivered]. He did this when he was last at Ephesus), that they may be disciplined (taught by chastisement: "may be," because the effect of what was done still abides; the sentence was not yet taken off, nor the chastisement at an end) not to blaspheme (God, or Christ, whose holy name was brought to shame by these men associating it with unholy and unclean doctrines).

V., with "be made" below. This is, in order and importance, his first exhortation), that supplications, prayers, intercessions (the two former words are perhaps best distinguished as in Eph. vi. 18, by taking the first for prayer in general, the second for supplication or petition, the special content of any particular prayer. The third word should be marked with a reference to 'request concerning others,' i.e. intercessory prayer), thanksgivings, be made (literally, in the Greek, 'I exhort . . . to make prayers, &c.:' but our idiom requires the passive construction, as in the text) for all men (this gives the intercessory character to all that have preceded. On the wideness of Christian benevolence here inculcated, see the argument below, and Tit. iii. 2); for (i.e. 'especially for') —this one particular class being mentioned and no other) kings (see Tit. iii. 1; Rom. xiii. 1 ff.; 1 Pet. ii. 13. It was especially important that the Christians should include earthly powers in their formal public prayers, both on account of the object to be gained by such prayer [see next clause], and as an effectual answer to those adversaries who accused them of rebellious tendencies. And this was the uniform practice in the early church), and all that are in eminence (not literally, in authority, though the context, no less than common sense, shews that it would be so. Theodoret thinks that the Apostle added these words, including inferior officers, that his mention of kings might not seem to proceed from flattery. But the succeeding clause furnishes reason enough: the security of Christians would often be more dependent on inferior officers than even on kings themselves); that (aim of the prayer—not, as some think, subjective, that by such prayer Christian men's minds may be tranquillized and disposed to obey,—but objective, that we may obtain the blessing mentioned, by God's influencing the hearts of our rulers: or, as Chrysostom, that we may be in security by their being preserved in safety) we may pass a quiet and tranquil life ("for when they by their authority secure peace, we also have part in the calm, and fulfil the laws of piety in tranquillity," Theodoret) in all ('possible,' 'requisite') godliness (we are obliged in an English version to take this meaning for the peculiar word (eusebeia), which here represents the life and practice of a Christian. It is one of the terms peculiar in this meaning to the pastoral Epistles, the second Epistle of Peter [refl.], and Peter's speech in Acts iii. 12) and gravity (this word seems best to express the meaning. For as Chrysostom says, "For if they were not preserved, and met not with good success in their wars, it would throw our matters into trouble and disturbance. For either we must take up arms, when they are overthrown, or we must be scattered, and become fugitives;" and thus the gravity and decorum of the Christian life would be broken up).

3, 4.] For this (viz. the making prayers, &c. for all men, &c. ver. 1: what has followed since being merely the continuation of this) is good and acceptable (both adjectives are to be taken with "in the sight of," &c., not, as some, the former as meaning "good in and of itself," and the latter only referred to God's estimate: compare 2 Cor. viii. 21, where "honourable" represents the same Greek word as is here used) in the sight of our Saviour (a title manifestly chosen as belonging to the matter in hand, compare the next verse. On it, see ch. i. 1), [even: there is no word here in the original] God, who (i. e. seeing that He) willeth all men to be saved (see ch. iv. 10: Tit. ii. 11. All men is repeated from verse 1. Chrysostom's comment is very noble: "Imitate God. If He willed all men to be saved, why then we ought to pray for all mankind. If He willeth all to be saved, do thou will it too; and if thou wilt it, pray. For prayer is the utterance of the will." Notice, not "God willeth to save all men," for in that case He would have done it: but God willeth all men to be saved: to accept the offered salvation. On this even God's predestination is contingent. Calvin most unworthily shuttles out of the decisive testimony borne by this passage to universal redemption, saying, "The Apostle simply means, that no people or rank in the world is excluded from salvation: because God willeth the Gospel to be propounded to all without exception. . . . The discourse is of kinds of men, not of individual persons: for he merely intends to include in this number kings and foreign peoples." ledge (the word imports a fuller and more assured acquaintance than mere knowledge, see 1 Cor. xiii. 12; Col. i. 11; ii. 2) of (the) truth (the expression is a favourite one in these Epistles, see 2 Tim. ii. 25; iii. 7; Titus i. 1. This realization of the truth is in fact identical with salvation, not only as that salvation is a rescue from life in untruth, but in its deepest and widest sense of salvation, here and hereafter: compare John xvii. 3).

5.] For (further grounding of the acceptableness of prayer for all men,—in the UNITY of God. But this verse is joined by the for directly to the preceding, not to ver. 1. Chrysostom gives it rightly,—“shewing that He willeth all to be saved”) there is ONE God (He is ONE in essence and one in purpose—not of different minds to different nations or individuals, but of one mind towards all. Similarly Rom. iii. 30, and, which is important for the understanding of that difficult passage, Gal. iii. 20. The double reference, to the unity in essence and unity of purpose, for which I have contended there, is plain and unmistakeable here), ONE Mediator (this word Mediator occurs, besides Gal. iii. 19, 20, only in the Epistle to the Heb., viii. 6; ix. 15; xii. 24. There is no necessity that the idea should be connected with that of a mutual covenant, and so be here far-fetched as regards the context: the word is used as standing alone, and representing the fact of Christ Jesus being the only go-between, in what-over sense) also of (between) God and men (if one only goes between, then that One must be for all), Christ Jesus [himself] man (why man? Theodoret answers, “He calls Christ man because he called Him a Mediator: for He became Mediator by becoming man.” and so most Commentators. But it is not here the Apostle’s object, to set forth the nature of Christ’s mediation as regards its being brought about;—only as regards its unity and universality for mankind. And for this latter reason he calls him here by this name MAN,—that He gathered up all our human nature into Himself, becoming its second Head. So that the assertion that He is man, in fact carries with it the very strongest proof of that which he is maintaining. Notice it is not, as in A. V., “the man Christ Jesus:” in personality, our Lord was not a man, but in nature He was man. The stupidity of such writers as Baur and the Socinians, who regard such an expression as against the deity of Christ, is beyond all power of mine to characterize. In the face of the words “one God, one Mediator between God and men,” to maintain gravely such a position, shews utter blindness from party bias even to the plainest thoughts expressed in the plainest words): who gave himself a ransom (literally, a payment in recompense: and this expresses more distinctly the reciprocity which is already implied in the simple word in each case. That the main fact alluded to here is the death of Christ, we know: but it is not brought into prominence, being included in, and superseded by the far greater and more comprehensive fact, that He gave HIMSELF, in all that He undertook for our redemption; see Phil. ii. 5—8) on behalf of all (not of a portion of mankind, but of all men; the point of ver. 1, for all men),—the testimony (‘that which was [to be] testified.’ This oneness of the Mediator, involving in itself the universality of Redemption, was the great subject of Christian testimony: see below) in its own seasons (in the times which God had appointed for it). For (towards) which (the testifying) I was placed as a herald (this is a word used in these pastoral Epistles and 2 Pet. only), and apostle (the proclaiming this universality of the Gospel was the one object towards which my appointment as an apostle and preacher was directed. Those who hold the spuriousness of our Epistle, regard this returning to himself and his own case on the part of the writer as an evidence of his being one who was acting the part of Paul. here a characteristic increase of the frequency of these personal vindications on the part of the Apostle, as we so often have occasion to remark during these Epistles:—the disposition of one who had been long opposed and worried by adversaries to recur continually to his own claims, the assertion of which had now become with him almost, so to speak, a matter of stock-phrases. Still, the propriety of the assertion here is evident: it is only in the manner of it that the above habit is discernible. See more on this in the Introduction. The same phrase occurs verbatim in 2 Tim. i. 11), —I speak the truth in Christ, I lie not—(in spite of all that some Commentators say of the evident appropriateness of this solemn asseveration here, I own I am unable to regard it as any more than a strong and interesting proof of the growth of a habit in the Apostle's mind, which we already trace in 2 Cor. xi. 31, Rom. ix. 1, till he came to use the phrase with less force and relevance than he had once done. Nothing can be more natural than that one whose life was spent in strong conflict and assertion of his Apostleship, should repeat the fervour of his usual asseveration, even when the occasion of that fervour had passed away)—a teacher of the Gentiles (it was especially in this latter fact that the assertion of the universality of the Gospel found its justification. The historical proof of his constitution as a teacher of the Gentiles is to be found in Acts ix. 15, xxii. 21, xxvi. 17; but especially in Gal. ii. 9) in (the) faith and (the) truth (do these words refer subjectively to his own conduct in teaching the Gentiles, or objectively to that in which he was to instruct them? The former view is taken by Theodoret and most Commentators: the latter by some moderns. In judging between these, we must take into account the usage of "truth" above, ver. 4, in a very similar reference, when it was to be matter of teaching to all men. There it undoubtedly is the truth of God. I would therefore take it similarly here,—the sphere in which both his teaching and their learning was to be employed—the truth of the Gospel. Then, if so, it is surely harsh to make faith subjective, especially as the "in" is not repeated before "truth." It too will most properly be objective,—and likewise regard that in which as an element or sphere, he was to teach and they to learn: the faith).

8.] See summary at beginning of chapter.

I will then that the men (the A. V., by omitting the article, has entirely obscured this passage for its English readers, not one in a hundred of whom ever dream of a distinction of the sexes being here intended) pray in every place (these words regard the general duty of praying. It is a local command respecting prayer, answering to the temporal command, "pray unceasingly," 1 Thess. v. 17. It is far-fetched and irrelevant to the context to find in the words, as Chrysostom and others, the Christian's freedom from prescription of place for prayer), lifting up holy hands (see Ps. lxxiii. 4; xxviii. 2; xlv. 20. Clement of Rome, in his first Epistle to the Corinthians, says, "Let us approach unto Him in holiness of soul, lifting up unto Him chaste and undefiled hands." These two passages testify to the practice in the Christian church. Those hands are holy, which have not surrendered themselves as instruments of evil desire: the contrary are polluted hands, 2 Macc. v. 16: compare, for the expression, Job xvii. 9, Ps. xxiv. 4, and in the New Test, especially James iv. 8), without (separate from, "putting away") wrath and disputation (i. e. in tranquillity and mutual peace, or, doubting, which is a kind of disputation within one's self).

9.] In like manner also (this, by the parallel passage, Tit. ii. 3, seems to be little more than a copula, not necessarily to refer to the matter which has been last under treatment), I will that women (without the article, the reference to "the men" above is not so pointed: i. e. we need not imagine that the reference is necessarily to the same matter of detail, but may regard the verse [see below] as being to the general duties and behaviour of women, as not belonging to the category of those who are to pray in every place. The question, 'what then are women to do?' is answered by insisting on modesty of appearance and the ornament of good works, as contrasted [ver. 12] with the man's part. The public assemblies are doubtless, in ver. 12, still before the Apostle's mind, but in a very slight degree. It is the general duties of women, rather than any single point in reference to their conduct in public worship, to which he is calling attention: though the subject of public worship led to his thus speaking, and has not altogether disappeared from his thoughts) adorn themselves in orderly apparel (see Tit. ii. 3, note: "in seemly guise," Ellicott) with shamefastness (not, as modern reprints of the A. V., 'shamefacedness,' which is a mere unmeaning corruption by the printers of a very expressive and beautiful word. Archbishop Trench says (Synonyms of the New Test., § 20), "It is a pity that 'shamefast' and 'shamefastness,' which last word our translators used here, should have been corrupted in modern use to 'shamefaced' and 'shamefacedness.' The words are properly of the same formation as 'steadfast,' 'steadfastness,' 'soothfast,' 'soothfastness,' and those good old English words, now lost to us, 'rootfast,' and 'rootfastness.' As by 'rootfast' our fathers understood that which was firm and fast by its root, so by 'shamefast' in like manner, that which was established and made fast by an honourable shame. To change this into 'shamefaced' is to allow all the meaning and force of the word to run to the surface, to leave us ethically a far inferior word. It is very inexcusable that all modern reprints of the Authorized Version have given in to this corruption'), and self-restraint (or, sobermindedness) ("if," Trench concludes, "the former word is the 'shamefastness,' or tendency which shrinks from overpassing the limits of womanly reserve and modesty, as well as from the dishonour which would justly attach thereto, this word is that habitual inner self-government, with its constant rein on all the passions and desires, which would hinder the temptation to this from arising, or at all events from arising in such strength as should overbear the checks and hindrances which shamefastness opposed to it." Ellicott explains it, "the well-balanced state of mind, arising from habitual self-restraint"); not in plaits (of hair: compare 1 Pet. iii. 3) and gold ("putting on of golden ornaments," 1 Pet. as above: from the use of and, the gold is supposed to be twined among, or worn with, the plaited hair. Second reason—as the woman was last in being, so she was first in sin—indeed the only victim of the Tempter's deceit. And Adam was not deceived (the serpent deceived the woman: the woman did not deceive her husband, but persuaded him. We read of no communication between the serpent and the man. The "subtlest beast of all the field" knew his course better: she listened to the lower solicitation of sense and expediency: he to the higher one of conjugal love), but the woman (not now Eve, but generic, as the next clause shews: for Eve could not be the subject of what is said in the next verse) having been seduced by the deceit (the verb is one implying the full success of the deceit) has become involved (the thought is—the present state of transgression in which the woman [and the man too: but that is not treated here] by sin is constituted, arose [which was not so in the man] from her originally having been seduced by deceit) in transgression (here as always, breach of a positive command: compare Rom. iv. 15). <sup>15.</sup>

But (contrast to this her great and original defect) she (general) shall be saved through (brought safely through, but in the higher, which is with St. Paul the only sense of to save, see below) her childbearing (in order to understand the fulness of the meaning of "shall be saved" here, we must bear in mind the history itself, to which is the constant allusion. The curse on the woman for her transgression was, "In sorrow shalt thou bear children" [Gen. iii. 16]. Her childbearing is that in which the curse finds its operation. What then is here promised her? Not only exemption from that curse in its worst and heaviest effects: not merely that she shall safely bear children: but the Apostle uses the words shall be saved purposely for their higher meaning, and the construction of the sentence is precisely as 1 Cor. iii. 15, "He himself shall be saved, but so as through fire." Just as that man should be saved through, as passing through, fire which is his trial, his hindrance in his way, in spite of which he escapes,—so she shall be saved, through, as passing through, her childbearing, which is her trial, her curse, her (not means of salvation, but) hindrance in the way of it.—The other renderings which have been given seem to me both irrelevant and ungrammatical. See them treated in my Greek Test., if they (generic plural, as before singular) have remained (so literally: shall be found in that day to have remained—a further proof of the higher meaning of "shall be saved") in faith and love and holiness (see 1 Thess. iv. 4, 7; Heb. xii. 14, where the word is used in the same reference of holy chastity) with sobermindedness (see above on ver. 9).

The "episcopi" of the N. T. have officially nothing in common with our Bishops. In Acts xx. 17, the A. V. ought to have been consistent with itself, and to have rendered the word bishops always, not bishops in one place and overseers in another, to suit ecclesiastical prejudices. It would be better to adopt the other alternative, and always to render it overseers, were not that word to common English readers appropriated to another kind of office. Thus we should avoid any chance of identifying it with a present and different office, and take refuge in the meaning of the word itself, which at the same time bears an important testimony to the duties of the post.—The identity of the "bishop" and "presbyter" in apostolic times is evident from Tit. i. 5–7: see also note on Phil. i. 1, he desireth a good work (not 'a good thing:' but a good employment: see 1 Thess. v. 13: 2 Tim. iv. 5: one of the "good works" so often spoken of). It behoves then (then is best regarded as taking up the term "a good work," and substantiating that assertion: "a good work must be entrusted to good men") a bishop (generic) to be irreproachable (Theodoret draws an important distinction: "not to afford just cause for blame: this is what he says, not that he should not be the object of slander, for this the Apostle himself was in many ways"), husband of one wife (two great varieties of interpretation of these words have prevailed, among those who agree to take them as restrictive, not injunctive, which the spirit of the passage and the insertion of the word one surely alike forbid. They have been supposed to prohibit either 1) simultaneous polygamy, or 2) successive polygamy. 1) has somewhat to be said for it. The custom of polygamy was then prevalent among the Jews [Justin Martyr says that their Rabbis even then permitted them to have four or five wives apiece. This was in the middle of the second century], and might easily find its way into the Christian community. And such, it is argued, was the Apostle's reference, not to second marriages, which he himself commands ch. v. 14, and allows in several other places, e. g. Rom. vii. 2, 3: 1 Cor. vii. 39. But the objection to taking this meaning is, that the Apostle would hardly have specified that as a requisite for the episcopate or presbyterate, which we know to have been fulfilled by all Christians whatever: no instance being adduced of polygamy being practised in the Christian church, and no exhortations to abstain from it. As to St. Paul's command and permissions, see below. Still, we must not lose sight of the circumstance that the earlier Commentators were unanimous for this view. 2) For the view that second marriages are prohibited to aspirants after the episcopate,—is, the most probable meaning [see there] of "wife of one husband" in ch. v. 9,—as also the wide prevalence in the early Church of the idea that, although second marriages were not forbidden to Christians, abstinence from them was better than indulgence in them. See this proved by various authorities cited in my Greek Test. With regard to the Apostle's own command and permissions of this state [see above], they do not come into account here, because they are confessedly (and expressly so in ch. v. 14) for those whom it was not contemplated to admit into ecclesiastical office. 3) There have been some divergent lines of interpretation, but they have not found many advocates. Some deny altogether the formal reference to 1) or 2), and understand the expression only of a chaste life of fidelity to the marriage vow: "that neither polygamy, nor concubinage, nor any offensive second marriage, should be able to be alleged against such a person." But surely this is very vague, for the precise words "husband of one wife." Bretschneider maintains that "one" is here the indefinite article, and that the Apostle means, a bishop should be the husband of a wife. This hardly needs serious refutation. Worse still is the Romanist evasion, which understands the "one wife" of the Church.—The view then which must I think be adopted, especially in presence of ch. v. 9 [where see note], is, that to candidates for the episcopate [presbytery] St. Paul forbids second marriage. He requires of them pre-eminent chastity, and abstinence from a licence which is allowed to other Christians. How far such a prohibition is to be considered binding on us, now that the Christian life has entered into another and totally different phase, is of course an open question for the present Christian church at any time to deal with. It must be as matter of course understood that regulations, in all lawful things, depend, even when made by an Apostle, on circumstances: and the superstitious observance of the letter in such cases is often pregnant with mischief to the people and cause of Christ), vigilant (probably in the more extended sense of the word;—a pattern of active sobriety and watchfulness: for all these five first adjectives are descriptive of positive qualities: “no brawler” giving the negative and more restricted opposite), soberminded (or, discreet; see above on ch. ii. 9), orderly (“what soberminded implies within, orderly implies without,” Bengel: thus expanded by Theodoret: “Both in voice and in manner and in look and in gait, so as to exhibit in his body the sobriety of his mind”), hospitable (loving, and entertaining strangers: see Heb. xiii. 2. This duty in the early days of the Christian church was one of great importance. Brethren in their travels could not resort to the houses of the heathen, and would be subject to insult in the public inns), apt in teaching (not merely given to teaching, but able and skilled in it. All might teach, to whom the Spirit imparted the gift: but skill in teaching was the especial office of the minister, on whom would fall the ordinary duty of instruction of believers and refutation of gainsayers).

rendered petulant by much wine. And perhaps the literal meaning should not be lost sight of. At the same time the word and its cognates were often used without reference to wine: and it will be best to extend the meaning to signify rather the character, than the mere fact, of the circumstance), not a striker (this word also may have a literal and narrower, or a metaphorical and wider sense. In this latter it is taken by Theodoret. But perhaps the coarser literal sense is better, as setting forth more broadly the opposite to the character of a Christian bishop); but (this contrast springs out of the two last, and is set off by them) for-bearing (reasonable and gentle. See note on Phil. iv. 5), averse from contention (compare 2 Tim. ii. 24), not a lover of money (not as some render it, liberal: it is not the positive virtue of liberality, but the negative one of abstinence from love of money, which, though it may lead to the other in men who have money, is yet a totally distinct thing. 4.] This positive requisite again seems to spring out of the negative ones which have preceded, and especially out of being no lover of money. The negatives are again resumed below); presiding well over his own house (“his own,” as contrasted with the church of God below. house, in its wide acceptation, ‘household,’ including all its members), having children (not “keeping [or having] his children,” as A. V.) [who are] in subjection with all gravity (“reverent modesty,” see ch. ii. 2. These words are best applied to the children, not to the head of the house, which acceptance of them rather belongs to the rendering impugned above. It is the gravity of the children, the result of his presiding over them, which is to prove that he knows how to preside over his own house,—not his own gravity in governing them: the matter of fact, that he has children who are in subjection to him in all gravity,—not his own keeping or endeavouring to keep them so. Want of success in ruling at home, not want of will to rule, would disqualify him for ruling the church. So that the distinction is an important one); but (contrast, as in ch. ii. 12, to the suppressed but imagined opposite case) if any man knoweth not how to preside over his own house (shews, by his children being insubordinate, that he has no skill in domestic government), how shall he (this future includes 'how can he,' but goes beyond it—appealing, not to the man's power, which conditions his success, but to the resulting matter of fact, which will be sure to substantiate his failure) take charge of the church of God ("he who knows not how to administer small things, how can he be entrusted with the charge of better and divine things?" Theodoret)?

6.] (The negative characteristics are resumed) Not a novice (a new convert. An objection has been raised to this precept, that it could hardly find place in the apostolic church, where all were new converts. It has been answered, that in Crete this might be so, and therefore such a precept would be out of place in the epistle to Titus, but the Ephesian church had been many years established. But it has been again rejoined to this, that the precepts are perfectly general, not of particular application. The real reply is to be found, partly by narrowing the range of the meaning of a new convert, partly in assigning a later date to these Epistles than is commonly held. The case here contemplated is that of one very recently converted. To ordain such a person to the ministry would, for the reason here assigned, be most inadvisable. But we cannot imagine that such period need be extended at the most to more than three or four years, in cases of men of full age who became Christians; and surely such a condition might be fulfilled by any of the Pauline churches, supposing this Epistle to bear any thing like the date which I have assigned to it in the Introd. § ii.), lest being besotted with pride (the word used is derived from a substantive signifying smoke or steam; and hence metaphorically, the pother which a man's pride raises about him so that he cannot see himself or others as they are. Hence the verb, which is used only in this metaphorical sense, means to be thus blinded, or bewildered, with pride or self-conceit) he fall into the judgment of the devil (these last words are ambiguous. Is of the devil [1] the genitive objective, 'the judgment into which the devil fell,'—or [2] the genitive subjective, 'the judgment which is wrought by the devil?' [1] is held by Chrysostom and many others ancient and modern ["into the same condemnation which came on him for his madness," Chrysostom]. [2] is held by Ambrose and others. Matthies says, "If a Christian church-overseer allowed himself to be involved in a charge of pride, the adversary (i.e., in the concrete, living men, his instruments) might by it have reason as well for the accusation of the individual as for inculpation of the congregation: compare ch. v. 14, Eph. iv. 27." In deciding between the above, one question must first be answered: are we obliged to preserve the same character of the genitive in verses 6 and 7? because, if so, we must manifestly take [2]: for the words there [see below] cannot bear any other meaning than 'the [reproach and] snare which the devil lays.' This question must be answered, not by any mere consideration of uniformity, but by careful enquiry into the import of the substantive judgment. I conceive we cannot understand it here otherwise than as a condemnatory sentence. This being so, it must be remembered that it is not the prerogative of the devil to judge or to condemn, and that sense [2] is by this negated. From the use of the decisive word judgment, I infer that it cannot be an act of the adversary which is here spoken of, but an act in which "the ruler of this world has been judged." Then as to uniformity with ver. 7, I should not be disposed to make much account of it. For one who so loved similarity of external phrase, even where different meanings were to be conveyed, as St. Paul, to use the genitives in "judgment of the devil," and "snare of the devil," in these different meanings, is surely nothing which need cause surprise:—of the devil is common to both: the devil's condemnation, and the devil's snare, are both alike alien from the Christian, in whom, as in his divine Master,

The "judgment of the devil" is in fact but the consummation of that state into which the "snare of the devil" is the introduction. I therefore unhesitatingly adopt (1)—the condemnation into which Satan fell through the same blinding effect of pride. <sup>7.]</sup>

Moreover (bringing in the contrast of addition; 'more than this,' . . . ) he must have a good testimony also (also, the addition itself of a new particular) from those without (the world, outside the church); lest he fall into (a question arises which must be answered before we can render the following words. Does reproach (1) stand alone, 'into reproach, and the snare of the devil,' or is it (2) to be joined with and the snare, as belonging to 'unto the reproach and the snare of the devil?' I have discussed these views, which depend mainly on grounds unappreciable by the English reader, in my Greek Test., and have come to the conclusion that (2) should be adopted, but without strong disapproval of the other) the reproach and the snare of the devil (this latter is usually taken as meaning, the danger of relapse: so Calvin: "lest being exposed to infamy, he begin to be hardened against shame, and with the greater licence prostitutes himself to all wickedness, which is to entangle himself in the nets of the devil. For what hope remains, when shame in sinners is gone?" Grotius gives it a different turn: "lest, being branded by contumelies, he seek to avenge himself." These, and many other references, may well be contained in the expression, and we need not, I think, be at the pains precisely to specify any one direction which the evil would take. Such an one's steps would be shackled—his freedom hampered—his temper irritated—his character lost—and the natural result would be a fall from his place, to the detriment not of himself only, but of the church of Christ).

The term or its cognates occur in a vaguer sense, but still indicating a special office, in Rom. xii. 7; 1 Pet. iv. 11. The connexion of the ecclesiastical deacons with the seven appointed in Acts vi. is very doubtful: see Chrysostom's and Œcumenius's testimony distinguishing them, in note there. But that the ecclesiastical order sprung out of similar necessities, and had for its field of work similar objects, can hardly be doubted) (must be) grave, not of double speech (this may mean, either, saying one thing and thinking another, or, which is more probable, as carrying out better the idea of double speech, saying one thing to one man and another thing to another, the two sayings being inconsistent with singleness of conviction and purpose), not addicted (applying themselves) to much wine (see Tit. ii. 3), not greedy of gain (hardly, as A. V., to be doubly rendered,—'greedy of filthy lucre.' As also Theodoret, "endeavouring to amass gain out of disgraceful and preposterous things." It would appear from Tit. i. 11, that all gain is disgraceful which is set before a man as a by-end in his work for God: so likewise in 1 Pet. v. 2, . . . 'nor with a view to gain,' such gain being necessarily base when thus sought. This particular of the deacons' character assumes special importance, if we connect it with the collecting and distributing alms); holding the mystery of the (or their) faith (that great objective truth which man of himself knows not, but which the Spirit of God reveals to the faithful: compare Rom. xvi. 25 f.: 1 Cor. ii. 7—10: and even Him who in fact

That expression makes it probable that the faith is here to be taken subjectively: the, or their, faith: the apprehension which appropriates to them the contents of God's revelation of Christ. That revelation of the Person of Christ, their faith's mystery, they are to hold) in pure conscience (see ch. i. 19. From those passages it appears, that we must not give the words a special application to their official life as deacons, but understand them of earnestness and singleness of Christian character: being in heart persuaded of the truth of that divine mystery which they profess to have apprehended by faith).

<sup>11.]</sup> (The) women in like manner (who are these? Are they (1) women who were to serve as deacons,—deaconesses?—or (2) wives of the deacons?—or (3) wives of the deacons and overseers?—or (4) women in general? I conceive we may dismiss (4) at once, for Chrysostom's reason: "Why should he in the midst of writing on another subject insert any thing respecting women?"—(3) upheld by Calvin and others, may for the same reason, seeing that he returns to the deacons again in ver. 12, be characterized as extremely improbable:—(2) has found many supporters among modern Commentators: and it is the rendering of the A. V. But it has against it (a) the omission in the original of all expressed reference to the deacons: (b) the expression in like manner, by which the deacons themselves were introduced in ver. 8, and which seems to mark a new ecclesiastical class: (c) the introduction of the injunction respecting the deacons in ver. 12, as a new particular, which would hardly be if their wives had been mentioned before: (d) the circumstance connected with the mention of Phœbe as deaconess of the Church at Cenchreæ in Rom. xvi. 1, that unless these are deaconesses, there would be among these injunctions no mention of an important class of persons employed as officers of the church. We come thus to consider (1), that these women are deaconesses,—ministrae, as Pliny calls them in his letter to Trajan [see note on Rom. xvi. 1]. In this view the ancients are as far as I know unanimous: and it is held by some of the ablest among the moderns. It is alleged against it—(a) that thus the return to the deacons, verse 12, would be harsh, or, as Conybeare says, "on that view the verse is most unnaturally interpolated in the midst of the discussion concerning the deacons." But the ready answer to this is found in Chrysostom's view of ver. 12, that under the word deacons, and their household duties, he comprehends in fact both sexes under one: (b) that the existence of deaconesses as an order in the ministry is after all not so clear. To this it might be answered, that even were they nowhere else mentioned, the present passage stands on its own grounds; and if it seemed from the context that such persons were indicated here, we should reason from this to the fact of their existence, not from the absence of other mention to their non-indication here. I decide then for (1): that these women are deaconesses) (must be grave, not slanderers (corresponds to "not doubletongued" in the males, slander being the vice to which the female sex is more addicted. 12.] General directions respecting those in the diaconate (of both sexes, the female being included in the male, see Chrysostom, cited above), with regard to their domestic condition and duties, as above (verses 4, 5) respecting the episcopate. Let the deacons be husbands of one wife (see on this above, ver. 2), ruling well over children (the emphatic position in the original, as above, ver. 4, makes it probable that the having children to rule is to be considered as a qualification: see Titus i. 6, note) and their own houses.

13.] The importance of true and faithful service in the diaconate.—For those who served well the office of deacon (past, not, perfect, “have served,” because the standing-point of the sentence is at first the great day, when their diaconate has passed by) are acquiring (thus literally: the Apostle having begun by placing himself at the great day of retribution, and consequently used the past, now shifts, so to speak, the scene, and deals with their present conduct: q. d., ‘Those who shall then be found to have served well, &c. . . . are now,’ &c.) for themselves (emphatic—besides the service they are rendering to the church) a good standing-place (viz. at the great day: compare ch. vi. 19.—and Dan. xii. 13, where however the metaphor is different.—The interpretations of this word, which literally means a step, or place to stand on, have been very various. (1) Very many, both ancients and moderns, understand it of a degree of ecclesiastical preferment, as that from the office of deacon to that of presbyter, and take “good” for a comparative. Against this is (a) the forcing of the word “good,” (b) the improbability that such a rise upwards through the ecclesiastical offices was known in the Apostle’s time: (c) the still greater unlikelihood, even if it were known, that he would propose as a motive to a deacon to fulfil his office well, the ambitious desire to rise out of it. (2)

Some among the moderns, following Calvin and Luther, understand by it a high place of honour in the esteem of the church. Against this is (a) that there is not a more distinct reference made to the estimation of the church: (b) that thus again an unworthy motive would be set before the deacons: (c) that again [see below] “great boldness,” or “confidence,” will not on this interpretation, bear any legitimate rendering: (d) the use of the past, they who served: see above. (3) Some take it spiritually, as meaning progress in the faith. But (a) the whole is of too objective a character thus to be interpreted of a merely subjective process—besides that (b) thus also we should require “are serving,” present, instead of “served,” past. (4) Theodoret and others understand it nearly as above—of the station or standing-place which the faithful deacon acquires before God, with reference to his own salvation. The opinions of these Commentators are, however, somewhat various as to the exact time to which the standing on this standing-place is to be referred. Theodoret refers it to the next life. Others understand that they procure to themselves a good expectation of salvation: a standing-place, i. e., in this life, with reference to the future one. I believe that the truth will be found by combining the two views. The past verb, served, as above stated, is used with reference to their finished course at that day. The term are obtaining transfers the scene to the present time. The standing-place is that which they are now securing for themselves, and will be found standing on at that day: belonging therefore in part to both periods, and not necessarily involving the idea of different degrees of blessedness, though that idea [see 1 Cor. iii. 15] is familiar to St. Paul,—but merely predicating the soundness of the ground on which these deacons will themselves stand), and much confidence (this also is variously understood, according as the standing-place is interpreted. Those who think of ecclesiastical preferment, render it ‘freedom

To these there might be no objection, but for the adjunct, in the faith which is in Christ Jesus. Thus defined, this boldness, or confidence, must necessarily have a subjective reference,—i.e. to the confidence towards God possessed by those who have made good advance in faith in Christ) in [the] faith (subjective, from what follows) which is in (reposing in) Christ Jesus.

14—16.] CLOSE OF THE ABOVE DIRECTIONS by a solemn statement of their object and its glorious import.—These things (the foregoing precepts, most naturally) I write unto thee, hoping (i.e. 'though I hope') to come to thee sooner (than may seem) (some supply,—before this Epistle come to thee: or, before thou shalt have need to put these precepts into practice: but the above filling up seems simpler, and suits better the usage elsewhere): but if I should delay (coming) (from "hoping" to "delay" may be regarded as parenthetical, the "that" belonging immediately to the preceding, "I write unto thee"), that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to conduct thyself in the house of God (see Heb. iii. 2, 5, 6, and notes: 1 Cor. iii. 16: 2 Cor. vi. 16: Eph. ii. 22: 1 Pet. ii. 5; iv. 17:—that congregation among whom God dwells, by His Spirit);—for such (the house of God) is the congregation (the word used commonly for church: but here, as Theodoret of Mopsuestia observes, "he means, not the place where prayer is made, as many think, but the assembly of the faithful") of the living God (thus designated for solemnity, and to shew His personal and active presence among them), the pillar (see below) and basement (it is a climax: the pillar is the intermediate, the basement, the final support of the building) of the truth (these latter words are variously referred. (1) Some of the modern Commentators break up the sentence, putting a period at "the living God," and proceeding, the pillar and ground of the truth, and without controversy great is the mystery, &c. To this I can only say, that if any one imagines St. Paul, or any other person capable of writing this Epistle, able to have indited such a sentence, I fear there is but little chance in arguing with him on the point in question. To say nothing of its abruptness and harshness, beyond all example even in these Epistles, how palpably does it betray the botching of modern conjectural arrangement in the wretched anti-climax—the pillar and basement [rising in solemnity] of the truth, and [what grander idea, after the basement of the whole building, does the reader suppose about to follow?] without controversy great! These two last words, which have [see below] their appropriate majesty and grandeur in their literal use at the emphatic opening of such a sentence as the next, are thus robbed of it all, and sink into the very lowest bathos; the metaphor being dropped, and the lofty imagery ending with a vague generality. If a sentence like this occurred in the Epistle, I should feel it a weightier argument against its genuineness than any which its opponents have yet adduced. (2) By Gregory of Nyssa among the ancients, and by some moderns, among whom are Chillingworth and Conybeare, it is taken as referring to TIMOTHY:—"that thou mayest know how to conduct thyself in the house of God, which is, &c. . . as a pillar and basement of the truth." Some of the Fathers seem also to have favoured the idea: but of these we must manifestly not claim for it those who have merely used the word pillar or column of an Apostle or teacher, or individual Christian,—as that is justified, independently of our passage, by Gal. ii. 9; Rev. iii. 12. Gregory of Nazianzum applies the very words to Eusebius of Samosata, and to Basil: and Basil in the Catena says, the Apostles also are pillars of Jerusalem, as it is said, "the pillar and basement of the truth:" and in the Epistle of the churches of Lyons and Vienne, it is said of Attalus, that "he has become for evermore the pillar and basement of the Christians there." The principal modern reasons for adopting this view have been (a) polemical—as against Roman Catholic infallibility of the Church, or (b) for uniformity of symbolism, seeing that in Gal. ii. 9, Rev. iii. 12, men are compared to pillars. On both of these I shall treat expressly below.—Grammatically (see my Greek Test.) there is no objection to this view.—But to the sentence itself thus arranged and understood, there are weighty, and I conceive fatal objections, arising from the force of the clauses in the original. In this case also, the words, "and without controversy," which follow, would most naturally refer, not to the great deposit of faith in Christ which is entrusted to the church to keep,—but to the very strong and unusual expression which had just been used of a young minister in the church,—"and confessedly great is the dignity of the least of the ministers of Christ: for," &c. (3) The reference to THE CHURCH is upheld by Chrysostom, Theodoret, &c., the Roman Commentators,—Luther, Calvin, Beza, Grotius, &c., &c. And this interpretation agrees with 2 Tim. ii. 19: see note there. But there is brought against it the objection, that there is thus introduced confusion of metaphor. The church, which was the house just now, becomes a pillar, a part of the house. This is not difficult to answer. The house contains in itself both pillar and basement—the pillar and the basement both belong to the house. Why may not the pillar be taken collectively? the very word church or congregation, occurring since, has pluralized the idea—the building consists of the faithful, who are so many pillars—why should it not in the aggregate be described as the pillar? The way in which the congregation of the faithful is the pillar and basement of the truth is admirably given by Theodoret: "He calls the assembly of the faithful the house and church of God. These he names the pillar and basement of the truth. For they remain founded fixedly and immoveably on the rock, and proclaiming by their actions the truths of the doctrines:" viz.

in that it is the element in which and medium by which the truth is conserved and upheld). 16.] And (follows on the preceding: it is indeed worth all thy care to conduct thyself worthily in this house of God—for that truth which is there conserved and upheld is great and glorious above all others, being [see below] none other in fact than THE LORD HIMSELF, in all His gracious manifestation and glorious triumph) confessedly ('as is acknowledged on all hands') great is the mystery (see ver. 9: that which was hidden from man until God revealed it, historically, in Redemption) of godliness (see ch. ii. 2, note: 'of the religious life.'—In order to comprehend fully what follows, we must endeavour to realize the train of thought in the Apostle's mind at the time. This 'mystery' of the life of God in man, is in fact the unfolding of Christ to and in him: the key-text to our passage being Col. i. 27, "To whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this MYSTERY among the Gentiles: WHICH IS, CHRIST AMONG YOU THE HOPE OF GLORY." This was the thought in St. Paul's mind; that the great revelation of the religious life is, CHRIST. And in accordance with his practice in these Epistles, written, as I believe, far on in his course, and after the figures and results of deep spiritual thoughts had been long familiar to him, he at once without explanation, or apology as beforetime in Col. i. 27, or expression of the word Christ, justifying the change of gender in the relative, joins the deep and latent thought with the superficial and obvious one, and without saying that the mystery is in fact Christ, passes from the mystery to the Person of Christ as being one and the same. Then, thus passing, he is naturally led to a summary of those particulars wherein Christ has been revealed as a ground for the godly recognition of His Church. And, the idea of MYSTERY being prominent before him, he selects especially those events in and by which Christ was manifested forth—came forth from that secrecy in which he had beforetime been hidden in the counsels of God, and shone out to men and angels as the Lord of life and glory. Let me say in passing, that it should be noticed, in a question which now happily no longer depends on internal considerations, how completely the whole glorious sentence is marred and disjoined by the substitution of the word GOD, found in the A. V., and so strenuously, even to this day, upheld by some. It is not the objective fact of God being manifested, of which the Apostle is speaking, but the life of God lived in the church,—the truth, of which the congregation of believers is the pillar and basement,—as identical [John xiv. 6] with Him who is its centre and heart and stock—as unfolded once for all in the unfolding of Him. The intimate and blessed link, furnished by the relative pronoun WHO, assuring the Church that it is not they that live, but Christ that liveth in them, is lost, if we understand the mystery merely as a fact, however important, historically revealed. There is hardly a passage in the New Test. in which I feel more deep personal thankfulness for the restoration of the true and wonderful connexion of the original text)—who (thus, and not ‘which,’ nor ‘He who,’ should we render, preserving the same transition, from the mystery, to Him of whom now all that follows is spoken. Who is, as stated in Ellicott, “a relative to an omitted though easily recognized antecedent, viz. Christ”) was manifested in the flesh (it has been often maintained of late, that these sentences, from their parallelism and symmetry, are taken from some hymn or confession of the ancient church. We cannot absolutely say that it may not have been so: but I should on all grounds regard it as very doubtful. I can see no reason why the same person who wrote the rhetorical passages, Rom. viii. 38, 39; xi. 33–36: 1 Cor. xiii. 4–7, and numerous others, might not, difference of time and modified mental characteristics being allowed for, have written this also. Once written, it would be sure to gain a place among the choice and treasured sayings of the Church, and might easily find its way into liturgical use: but I should be most inclined to think that we have here its first expression. The reason which some of the above Commentators adduce for their belief,—the abrupt insulation of the clauses disjoined from the thought in the context, has no weight with me: I on the other hand feel that so beautiful and majestic a sequence of thoughts springing directly from the context itself, can hardly be a fragment pieced in, but must present the free expansion of the mind of the writer in the treatment of his subject. On the sense of this clause, compare John i. 14,—and 2 Tim. i. 10. This is put first in the rank, as being the preliminary to all the rest. It is followed by the next clause, because the assertion and assurance of Christ's perfect unsinning righteousness was the aim of his manifestation in our flesh all those thirty years which preceded His public ministry: see below), was justified (i.e. approved to be righteous,—according to the uniform Pauline usage: not as De W., al., ‘proved to be what he was.’ The Apostle is following the historical order of events during the manifestation of our Lord on earth. That this is so, is manifest by the final clause including the Ascension. I take these events then in their order, and refer this to our Lord's baptism and temptation, in which His righteousness was approved and proved) in the Spirit (He was dwelt on by the Spirit in His baptism—led up by the Spirit to His great trial, and in the Spirit, His Spirit, that of which he said “the spirit indeed is willing but the flesh is weak,” He was proved to be righteous and spotless and separate from evil and its agent. See Rom. i. 3, 4, where another proof of this His spiritual perfection is given, viz. the great and crowning one of the Resurrection from the dead. Some have thought of that proof here also: others, of the continued course of His miracles, especially the Resurrection: some of the Resurrection and Ascension, by which He entered into His glory: others, in other ways. But I prefer keeping the historical order, though I would by no means limit the justification to that time only: then it was chiefly and prominently manifested), was seen by angels (viz. by means of His Incarnation, and specifically, when they came and ministered to Him after His temptation. This seems to be regarded as the first, or at all events is the first recorded occasion on which they ministered to Him. Theodoret says: “For even they saw not His invisible Godhead, but when He was incarnate, they beheld Him.” This, one of the particulars of the glory and manifestation of the incarnate Saviour, is, though not immediately concerning the mystery of piety as upheld in the Church, cited as belonging to the unfolding of that mystery in Christ), was preached among the nations (that preaching commencing with the sending out of the Apostles, and though not then, in the strict technical sense, carried on among the nations, yet being the beginning of that which waxed onward till it embraced all nations. See and Compare Rom. xvi. 26 [Eph. iii. 8]. So that we are still proceeding with our Lord's ministry, taking the nations in that wider sense in which the Jews themselves are numbered among them, and the fact itself as the great commencement of the proclamation of Christ to men), was believed on in the world (including all that winning of faith first from His disciples [John ii. 11], then from the Jews [ib. 23, viii. 30], and Samaritans [iv. 41, 42]: see also ib. x. 42. Our clause bears with it a reminiscence of His own great saying, John iii. 16 ff.), was received up in glory (at His Ascension. in glory: i.e. was taken up into, and reigns in, glory.—It is this distinct reference to the fact of our Lord's personal Ascension, which in my mind rules the whole sentence, and makes it, whatever further reference each clause may have, a chain of links of the divine manifestation of the Person of Christ, following in chronological order from His incarnation to His assumption into glory. The order and connexion of the clauses has been very variously understood, as may be seen in Wolf, and in De Wette. The triple antithesis, so characteristic of St. Paul, can hardly escape any reader: "in the flesh, in the spirit,—angels, the nations,—in the world, in glory:" but further it is hardly worth while to reproduce the distinctions which some have drawn, or motives for arrangement which they have supposed).

Some have supposed the Apostle to refer to some prophetic passage of the Old Test., or to the general testimony of the Old Test. prophecies [Dan. vii. 25; viii. 23; xi. 30], or those of our Lord [Matt. xxiv. 4 ff., 11], or of the Apostles [2 Thess. ii. 3 ff. 1 John ii. 18. 2 Pet. iii. 3. Jude 18], or all these combined. But in the two former cases, we should hardly have had the Spirit saith, but the Scripture, or the Lord, or the like; the words imply rather the present agency of the Spirit: and the latter is only a less clear way of putting the explanation given above: for why should writings be referred to, when the living men were yet testifying in the power of the Spirit among them? expression, "the spirit of error." The spirits are none other than the spirits of evil, tempting, energizing in, seducing, those who are described, just as the Spirit directs and dwells in those who abide in the faith, and teachings of dæmons (doctrines taught by, suggested by, evil spirits: compare James iii. 15. Two wrong interpretations have been given: (1) understanding the genitive as objective, 'teachings concerning dæmons;' so Mede and Heydenreich, which latter calls the term 'a characteristic designation of the Essene-Gnostic false teachers, who had so much to say of the higher spirit-world, of the æons, &c.:'—but against the context, in which there is no vestige of allusion to idolatry [notwithstanding all that is alleged by Mede], but only to a false and hypocritical asceticism: (2) applying the agency to the false teachers, who would seduce the persons under description; but this is without example harsh and improbable); in the (following in the . . . in giving the element, in which: see below) hypocrisy of those who speak lies; of men branded (with the foul marks of moral crime: a form of expression often found in secular writers. The verb used in the Greek is properly to burn in a mark with a branding-instrument of hot iron. The idea seems to be, as Ellicott explains it, that 'they knew the brand they bore, and yet, with a show of outward sanctity, they strove to beguile and seduce others, and make them as bad as themselves') on their own conscience (these false teachers are not only the organs of foul spirits, but are themselves hypocritical liars, with their own consciences seared by crime); forbidding to marry (this description has been thought by some to fit the Jewish sects of Essenes and Therapeutæ, who abstained from marriage. But the abstinence by and by mentioned seems too general to suit the idea that they were Jews [see below]: besides that the Epistle does not describe them as present—but as to come in after times), (commanding) (not expressed in the original. See a like ellipsis, in which a second but logically necessary verb is omitted, and must be supplied from the context,—in ch. ii. 12; 1 Cor. xiv. 34) to abstain from meats (compare Col. ii. 16. It does not appear here from what sort of food this abstinence would be enjoined: but probably the eating of flesh is alluded to. Eusebius quotes from Irenæus [i. 28] a description of men who called themselves Abstainers, or Temperance men, who preached celibacy and abstinence from eating flesh. These seem to be the persons here pointed at: and though the announcement of their success in after time is prophetic, we may fairly suppose that the seeds of their teaching were being sown as the Apostle wrote. The existence of gnosticism in its earlier form is certainly implied in ch. vi. 20: and in 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18, we find that denial of the resurrection which characterized all the varieties of subsequent gnosticism. See the whole subject discussed in the Introd. ch. vi. § i. 12 ff.), which God created unto participation with thanksgiving for those who believe and have [received the] (full) knowledge of the truth. This last description of the worthy partakers of God's bounties is well explained by Calvin, saying that though God pours forth His bounties on the just and unjust, it is only the faithful who are truly restored to that inheritance of the world which Adam had, but lost. On the words, with thanksgiving, see 1 Cor. x. 30: and below on ver. 4.

is in the writer's mind, and forms part of his own reasoning) every thing which God has made is good (in allusion to Gen. i. 31. See also Rom. xiv. 14, 20), and nothing (which God has made) is to be rejected, if received with thanksgiving ("properly, even without this condition, all things are pure: but he did not rise to this abstraction, because he was regarding meats not per se, but in their use, and this latter may become impure by an ungodly frame of mind." De Wette): for (see on because and for above) it (this subject is gathered out of the preceding clause by implication, and means, 'every created thing which is partaken of with thanksgiving') is sanctified (more than 'declared pure,' or even than 'rendered pure:' the latter it does not want, the former falls far short of the work of the assigned agents. The emphasis is on this word, and a new particular is introduced by it—not purity merely, but holiness,—fitness for the godly usage of Christian men. To this, which is more than mere making or declaring pure, it is set apart by the giving of thanks; so that the lesser is proved by the greater. There is certainly a slight trace of reference to the higher consecration in the Lord's Supper. The same word thanksgiving is common to both. Ordinary meals are set apart for ordinary Christian use by asking a blessing on them: that meal, for more than ordinary use, by asking on it its own peculiar blessing) by means of the word of God and intercession (what 'word of God?' how to be understood? Treating the plainer word first, the intercession meant is evidently intercession [see on ch. ii. 1] on behalf of the thing partaken of—that it may be 'sanctified to our use.' This may serve to guide us to the meaning of the word of God. And first, negatively. It cannot mean any thing which does not form part of the thanksgiving: such as God's word in the Scripture just cited, or in any other place: or, God's word in the foundation-truths of Christianity. Then, positively:

it must mean in some sense the thanksgiving, or something in it. But not the 'word addressed to God,' or 'prayer made to God,' which would be an unprecedented meaning for the word of God: the only way open for us is, that the thanksgiving itself, or some part of it, is in some sense the word of God. This may be (1) by its consisting in whole or in part of Scripture words, or (2) by the effusion of a Christian man, speaking in the power of God's Spirit, being known as the word of God. This latter is perhaps justified: but still it seems to me hardly probable, and I should prefer the former. It would generally be the case, that any form of Christian thanksgiving before meat would contain words of Scripture, or at all events thoughts in exact accordance with them: and such utterance of God's revealed will, bringing as it would the assembled family and their meal into harmony with Him, might well be said to sanctify the meats on the table for their use. Many of the Commentators quote from the (apocryphal but very ancient) Apostolic Constitution, the following grace before meat, used in the primitive times: "Blessed art Thou, O Lord, who nourishest me from my youth, who givest food to all flesh. Fill our hearts with joy and gladness, that always having all competence, we may abound unto every good work in Christ Jesus our Lord, through whom be unto Thee honour and might for ever. Amen." Here almost every clause is taken from some expression of Scripture).

good servant of Christ Jesus, training thyself in (the idea of the word used is not 'to nourish oneself with,' but to grow up amongst, or to be trained in. The present tense denotes continuance in this training: see 2 Tim. iii. 14) the words of the faith (the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel), and of the good instruction, the course of which thou hast followed ('hast followed along, by tracing its course and accompanying it'). <sup>7.]</sup> But profane and anile fables (see notes on ch. i. 4 and 7, and Introd.) decline (literally, 'excuse thyself from'), but rather exercise thyself for [unto] godliness. unto, i. e., with a view to, as an athlete with a view to the games.

<sup>8.]</sup> For the exercise (gymnastic training: see below) of the body is to small extent ('for but a little,'—in reference only to a small department of a man's being) profitable (to what sort of exercisedoes he allude? Many take it as alluding to corporal austerities for religion's sake: so Calvin. But against this are two considerations: 1) that these are not now in question, but the immediate subject is the excellence of being trained and thoroughly exercised in piety: 2) that if they were, it would hardly be consistent with his previous severe characterization of these austerities, ver. 3, to introduce them thus with even so much creditable mention. It is therefore far better to understand the words with Chrysostom and many others, of mere gymnastic bodily exercise, of which the Apostle says, that it has indeed its uses, but these uses partial only): but godliness (the first member of the antithesis contained the means, bodily exercise: this, the end, godliness;—that which is sought by exercise unto godliness) is profitable for all things (not one portion only of a man's being, but every portion of it, bodily and spiritual, temporal and eternal), having (seeing that it has) promise of life, both that which is now, and that which is to come. <sup>9.]</sup> Faithful is the saying and worthy of all acceptation (see on ch. i. 15. The words refer to what follows, not to what went immediately before: see on for below. The connexion is with the mention of the life to come. Godliness has the promise of that life attached to it, according to the well-known Christian saying which follows. Otherwise verse 10 comes in disjointedly and unaccountably). For (for is introduced from a mixture of two constructions, rendering a reason for "and that which is to come," as if "Faithful is the saying" had not been inserted. We have the same construction in 2 Tim. ii. 11) to this end (viz. the salvation implied in that which follows) we (Christians in general) [both] toil (more than labour: it gives the idea of 'toil and moil') and suffer reproach (climax: we might toil and be had in honour, but as it is, we have both fatigue and shame to bear), because we have set our hope (the perfect refers to the time when the strong resolve and waiting began, and to its endurance since that time) on the living (inserted for emphasis and solemnity, to bring out the fact that the God in whom we trust is a veritable personal agent, not a creature of the imagination) God, who is the Saviour of all men (compare ch. ii. 4; Tit. ii. 11: His will is that all men should be saved, and He has made full and sufficient provision for the salvation of all: so that, as far as salvation stands in Him, He is the Saviour of all men. And it is in virtue of this universality of salvation offered by God, that we have rested our hopes on Him and become believers), especially them that believe (in these alone does that universal salvation, which God has provided, become actual. He is the same Saviour towards and of all: but these alone appropriate His salvation). <sup>11.</sup> Command (see ch. i. 3) these things (viz. those insisted on since ver. 7) and teach them.

<sup>12—16.</sup> General exhortations to Timothy. Let no one despise thy youth (as to the matter of the youth of Timothy, see Introd. ch. vi. § ii. 35, note; and remember, that his age, relative to that of the Apostle himself, whose place he was filling, rather than his absolute age, is evidently that which is here meant. By the words "till I come," we see that this comparison was before the Apostle's mind. The interpretation of Bengel, "So behave thyself, that no one may be able to despise thee as they would a youth," thus endeavouring to eliminate the fact of Timothy's youth, is forced, and inconsistent with the form of the sentence in the original. It is quite true [compare what follows] that the exhortation is to him, not to the Ephesian church: but it is grounded on the fact of his youth, in whatever light that fact is to be interpreted);—but become (by gaining their respect for the following acts and qualities) a pattern of the believers,—in word (the whole of thine utterances, in public and private: in word is elsewhere contrasted, as in Col. iii. 17, with in deed), in behaviour (the other outward sign of the life within: in deed, as in Col. iii. 17, but expressing more—"in thy daily habits." These may testify, in cases where no actual deed is done), in love, in faith (the two great springs of Christian conduct, the one it is true set in motion by the other,—compare Gal. v. 6, "faith working by love,"—but both, leading principles of the whole man), in purity (probably, not chastity, in the more restricted sense, though in ch. v. 2 it certainly has this meaning from the context: but in the wider and higher meaning which the context here requires, all believers being in view, of general holiness and purity. Compare for this,—ch. v. 22: 2 Cor. vii. 11: James iii. 17; iv. 8: 1 Pet. i. 22. From these passages the quality would appear definable as simplicity of holy motive followed out in consistency of holy action).

<sup>13.</sup> Till I come (not as De Wette explains it, as long as thou in my absence presidest over the Ephesian church: for this supposes the Apostle to be the normal president of that Church, and Timothy his locum-tenens, which was not the case. Timothy was put there with a special commission from the Apostle: that commission would cease at the Apostle's coming, not because he would resume residence and presidency, but because he would enforce and complete the work of Timothy, and thus, the necessity for special interference being at an end, the church would revert to the normal rule of its own presbytery), attend to the (public) reading of the Scripture in the church. Whether the Old Test. Scriptures alone, or in addition to them the earlier gospels were at this time included in this public reading, cannot be determined with any certainty. Justin Martyr seems to say that the "memoirs of the Apostles were read, as well as the books of the prophets"), to the (also public) exhortation, to the (also public) teaching (these two follow upon the reading: the one hor-tatory, the other explanatory: the one regards practice, the other knowledge).

14.] Do not neglect (see 2 Tim. i. 6,—do not suffer to decay and smoulder by carelessness. "They neglect gifts," says Bengel, "who do not exercise them, and fancy that they shall not lose them") the spiritual gift which is in thee (see more at length on 2 Tim. i. 6. The spiritual gift was that of teaching and ruling the church: it was not teaching only, but the whole grace of God given him for the office to which he was set apart by special ordination), which was given thee (by God, 1 Cor. xii. 4, 6) by means of prophecy (ch. i. 18 refers to the same fact as this—viz. that, either at the first conversion of Timothy, or at his ordination to the ministry [and certainly the latter seems here to be pointed at], the Holy Spirit spoke, by means of a prophet or prophets, His will to invest him with gifts for the work, and thus the gift was said to be conferred, as to its certainty in the divine counsels, by such prophecy, the Holy Spirit commanding it by the mouth of the prophets), with laying on of the hands (see on Acts vi. 6. There is no real difference between this and 2 Tim. i. 6. There was a special reason there for putting Timothy in mind of the fact that the Apostle's own hands were laid on him: but that fact does not exclude this) of the presbytery (the body of elders who belonged to the congregation in which he was ordained. Where this was, we know not: hardly in Lystra, where he was first converted: might it not be in Ephesus itself, for this particular office?).

15.] These things (viz. the things enjoined vv. 12—14) do thou care for; in these things be [employed]; that thy progress (towards perfection; certainly in the Christian life: this is implied; but the more direct meaning is, 'with reference to the duties of thine office:' and especially as respects the caution given ver. 12, that no man despise thy youth) may be manifest to all.

16.] Give heed to thyself (summary of ver. 12), and to thy teaching (summary of ver. 13. "A good pastor ought to have two cares—to be earnest in teaching, and to keep himself pure. And it is not enough if he fashion his life in all honesty, and with every care to set no bad example, unless he also join to his holy life zeal in teaching: nor will his doctrine avail much unless his honesty and sanctity of life be correspondent thereto." Calvin); continue in them (most naturally, "these things," of ver. 15: but the words are ambiguous and puzzling. I have punctuated so as to connect this clause with what follows, and thus to render it not quite so harsh, seeing that it then will assume the form of a recapitulatory conclusion), for doing this (so literally, 'in doing this,' as A. V., is better than 'by doing this,' which asserts too much) thou shalt save (in the day of the Lord: the highest meaning, and no other, is to be thought of in both cases) both thyself, and those that hear thee (thyself, in the faithful discharge of the ministry which thou hast received of the Lord: thy hearers, in the power of thine influence over them, by God's word and ordinances).

either sex. an elder] or it may be, a presbyter, as we are sometimes obliged to render the word. The reference to an office was called in question as early as Chrysostom: "Does he mean the office? I think not, but he is speaking of every old man." This indeed is evident from the quadruple specification in these verses: older men—elder women: younger men—younger women. the younger men] Understand, exhort. Thus the prohibition, rebuke not sharply, applies to all, all being included in the command, to exhort, which is the other and adopted alternative.

as brethren] as on an equality with them, not lording it over them.

as sisters] i.e. in all chastity. The rule of Jerome is simple: "All the young women and virgins of Christ do thou either equally avoid, or equally love."

3—16.] Directions concerning widows. This whole passage is somewhat difficult, and has been very variously understood. The differences will be seen below.

3. take into consideration] literally, honour: but how? Is "honour" to be interpreted generally, 'honour' merely, or with reference to the context? The best guide to an answer will be what follows. If the command be merely to hold them in honour, why should the destitute be held in more honour than those who had families? The command to honour widows would surely apply to all alike. But seeing that it does not apply to all alike, we must necessarily limit its general meaning to that particular in which the one would be honoured, and the other not. Thus without giving or seeking for an unusual meaning to the word, we may fairly interpret it of this particular kind of honour, viz. being inscribed on the Church's list or roll (ver. 9), as a fit object of charitable sustenance. That such a roll existed in the very earliest days of the church, we know from Acts vi. 1: from Ignatius,

Justin Martyr, and Eusebius. that are widows indeed] Compare ver. 16 below,—those who are really in a widowed (destitute) state, as contrasted with those described ver. 4. But then the enquiry has been made, Is this being a widow indeed to be defined by mere external circumstances, or not rather by the religious character, described below, ver. 5? Or are we to bind (as Chrysostom and others do) the two together? In a certain sense I believe we must thus unite them. The Apostle commands, 'Honour (by placing on the list) those who are widows indeed;' for it is these especially, they who are destitute of earthly friends, who are most likely to carry out the true religious duties of a widow. Thus, without the two qualifications being actually united, the former is insisted on as ordinarily ensuring the latter.

4.] The case of the widow who is not a widow indeed, having earthly relations answerable for her support.

"their own household" is thus the simple and usual one, as the widow in question would be the head of the household. On hypothesis (2), to behave piously towards, i. e. to honour with the honour which God commands, their own family, i. e. the widowed mother or grandmother who is one of their own family. This sense of the verb is common enough: the reference being generally (not always, it is true) to superiors,—those who demand reverence,—those who stand in the place of God. This sense of their own family or household is not so usual, but not therefore to be rejected. To dishonour their widowed mother or grandmother, would be to dishonour their own family, in that one of its members who most required respect.

and to requite their parents] On hypothesis (1), as Chrysostom, "They (their parents) are dead and gone—thou canst not requite them: thou didst not beget them, nor yet bring them up. Requite it to them in their grandchildren: pay your debt through their posterity." But surely it is a very strange way of requiting our progenitors for their care of us, to be kind towards our own children: and besides, what would this have to do with the question, whether or not the widow was to be put on the charity roll of the church? But on hypothesis (2) this sentence certainly becomes more clear and natural. Let them, the children or grandchildren, learn first to be piously grateful to (these members of) their own families, and to give back returns (a return in each case) to their progenitors (so called, although living, because, the mother and grandmother having been both mentioned, parents was the only word which would include them in one category).

for this, &c.] See ch. ii. 3. 5.] See above on ver. 3. she that is a widow indeed, as opposed to the widow just described; and desolate, as contrasting her condition with that of her who has children or grandchildren. Thus what follows is said more for moral eulogy of such a widow, than as commending her to the charity of the Church: but at the same time, as pointing out that one who thus places her hopes and spends her time, is best deserving of the Church's help.

hath set] The word implies, 'and continues to set,' her hope. toward God, as its portion and ultimate aim,—as distinguished from "on God," ch. iv. 10, on God as its present stay.

her (or, the) supplications and her (or, the) prayers (i. e. either her own, private, or the public prayers of the Church).

night and day] So St. Luke of Anna the prophetess, ii. 37.

6.] Contrast to the character just described: and that certainly with a view to point out that this kind of widow is no object for the charity of the Church, as not being at all a partaker of the life unto God.

is given to dissipation] The Greek word which I have thus rendered signifies to live riotously or retchlessly. is dead while she liveth] while alive in the flesh, has no real life in the Spirit: see ref.—and Matt. viii. 22: Eph. v. 14. I cannot help regarding the idea as in the background,—'and, if devoid of spiritual life, then not to be taken into account by the Church.'

7.] these things most naturally applies to the characters just given of widows, not more generally: and in that case the words "that they may be irreproachable" must refer to the widows also, not to the children and grandchildren, or to these and the widows together, or more widely still. This narrower reference is confirmed by the next verse, which takes up the duty of the relations, being connected not by "for," but by "but."

the saying is perfectly general, grounding their duties on an axiomatic truth.

provide not for, viz. in the way noted above, — of support and sustenance.

his own seem to be, generally any connexions, — those of his own house, those more immediately included in one's own family as dwelling in the same house.

he hath denied the faith] "For," says Bengel, "the faith does not abolish natural duties, but perfects and confirms them."—The Roman-Catholic commentator Mack has some good remarks here, on the faith of which the Apostle speaks: "Faith, in the sense of the Apostle, cannot exist, without including love: for the subject-matter of faith is not mere opinion, but the grace and truth of God, to which he that believes gives up his spirit, as he that loves gives up his heart: the subject-matter of faith is also the object of love. Where therefore love is not nor works, there is not, nor works, faith either: so that he who fulfils not the offices of love towards his relatives, is virtually an unbeliever."

worse than an unbeliever] For even among heathens the common duties of family piety are recognized: if therefore a Christian repudiates them, he lowers himself beneath the heathen. Compare Matt. v. 46, 47. Also, as Calvin suggests in addition, the Christian who lives in the light of the Gospel, has less excuse for breaking those laws of nature which even without the Gospel are recognized by men.—According to hypothesis (1) or (2) above, this general statement applies to the widows or to their children and grandchildren. But surely it would be very harsh to understand it of the widows: and this forms an additional argument for hypothesis (2).

9—16.] Further regulations respecting widows.

9.] Let a woman be inserted in the catalogue as a widow. But now, for what purpose? What catalogue are we to understand? Hardly, (1) that of those who are to receive relief from the Church (so Chrysostom and many others): for thus the rule, that she is to be sixty years of age, would seem a harsh one, as many widows might be destitute at a far earlier age: as also the rule that she must not have been twice married, especially as the Apostle himself below commands second marriage for the younger widows. Again, the duties enjoined in ver. 10 presuppose some degree of competence, and thus, on this hypothesis, the widows of the poorer classes would be excluded from sustenance by charity,—who most of all others would require it. Also, for the reason alleged in ver. 11, sustenance can hardly be in question—for then the re-marrying would simply take them off the roll, and thus be rather a benefit, than a detriment to the Church. Nor again (2) can we understand the roll to be that of the deaconesses, as some do: although the Theodosian code, founded on this interpretation, ordained "that none should be taken into the number of the deaconesses under sixty years old, according to the precept of the Apostle." For, a) the age mentioned is unfit for the work of the deaconesses' office, and in the council of Chalcedon the age of the deaconesses was fixed at forty: b) not only widows but virgins were elected deaconesses: (3) it is implied in ver. 12, that these widows were bound not to marry again, which was not the case with the deaconesses. It seems therefore better to understand here some especial band of widows, sustained perhaps at the expense of the church, but not the only ones who were thus supported:—set apart for ecclesiastical duties, and bound to the service of God. Such are understood here by Chrysostom himself in his homily on the passage. They are also mentioned as the band of widows, as presbytrresses, as having precedence of rank: i. e. such widows as corresponded in office for their own sex in some measure to the presbyters,—sat unveiled in the assemblies in a separate place, by the presbyters, and had a kind of supervision over their own sex, especially over the widows and orphans: were vowed to perpetual widowhood, clad with 'widow's vestments,' and ordained by laying on of hands. This institution of the early church, which was abolished by the eleventh canon of the council of Laodicea, is sufficiently affirmed by many of the Fathers. De Wette makes the allusion to this 'institute of widows' one proof of the post-apostolic date of the Epistle: but on this see Introd. ch. vi. § i.

Here, as contemporaneous polygamy is out of the question, and thus one element of difficulty in the other case is eliminated, we can hardly understand any thing other than that the aged widow spoken of should have been the wife of only one husband: i. e., not married a second time. So that the parallel expressions here and in ch. iii. 2 will be consistently interpreted), having a good character (testimony from without, compare ch. iii. 7) in (the element or region in which that testimony is versed) good works; if (the conditions have as yet been expressed by participles in agreement with the noun: the construction is now changed for the hypotheticalal) she at any time brought up children (her own? or those of others? Still this latter, considering that entertaining strangers is the next good work specified, seems most probable), if she (at any time) entertained strangers (practised hospitality. This clearly points out a person above the rank of the poor and indigent: though Chrysostom pithily replies, "Even if she be poor, she has a house. For I don't suppose she dwells in the open air." One is glad to hear that all the Christian widows at Constantinople were so well off. But it can hardly have been so in the apostolic age. Compare, on the subject of hospitality, ch. iii. 2: Tit. i. 8: Rom. xii. 13: Heb. xiii. 2), if she (at any time) washed the feet of the saints (this may be an expression intended to signify performing the humblest offices. Still, we must not dismiss from our consideration the external act itself: as Theodoret reminds us, it was an ancient practice among Christians: see John xiii. 14, and note, in which, though a formal ceremony in obedience to our Saviour's words is repudiated, the principle of humbly serving one another, which would lead to such an act on occasion presented, is maintained), if she (at any time) relieved the distressed (not merely the poor, but those afflicted in any way), if she followed every good work (Chrysostom, in his fine homily on this passage, cited above, says: "What is the following every good work? It is, for example, the going into a prison and visiting the prisoners, the visiting the sick, the comforting the distressed, the soothing those who are in pain, the contributing in every way all that is possible, and declining nothing that may tend to the well-being and refreshment of them that are our brethren." Bengel's idea, "that it is the part of those in high station, and of men, to set the example of good works, and of women, to follow, in helping on as much as they can," is ingenious but wrong. For the expression, "to follow good works," is used in Greek of those who do them as a pursuit of life, without reference to any relative priority).

11.] But younger widows decline (to place on the roll, see above on ver. 9: not 'avoid,' for fear of scandal, as Chrysostom in the homily above cited: nor both of these combined, as Huther: nor 'decline as objects for the alms of the church,' as some above): for when they shall wax wanton against Christ (their proper bridegroom), they desire to (the A. V. has utterly confused the sense by rendering "they will marry," as if it were a simple future) marry (again); bearing (on themselves, as a burden: see Gal. v. 10) a judgment (from God:

and as the context necessarily implies, condemnation: but we must not so express it in a version: that which is left to be fixed by the context in the original, should be also left in a translation), because they set at naught their first faith (i. e. broke, made void, their former promise. Having devoted themselves to widowhood as their state of life, and to the duties of the order of presbytresses as their occupation, they will thus be guilty of a dereliction of their deliberate promise. Of the later vows of celibacy, and ascetic views with regard to second marriages, there is no trace).

13.] Moreover they also learn to be idle (it might be objected, that idleness is the cause, not the effect, of going about, &c.: but it may well be answered, that not only does a spirit of idleness give rise to such going about, but such going about confirms the habit of idleness), going about from house to house (literally, "the houses," viz. of the faithful); but (so literally) not only (to be) idle, but also gossips and busybodies, speaking things which are not fitting (his fear is, that these younger widows will not only do the Church's work idly, but make mischief by bearing about tales and scandal). I will therefore ('in consequence of these things being so, I desire') that younger widows (the word "widows" is not in the original: but such, and not the younger women, is evidently the Apostle's meaning. The whole passage has concerned widows—and to them he returns again, ver. 16) marry (not as Chrysostom, "Seeing that they wish it, I wish it too. They should indeed have cared for the things of God,—they should have kept their faith: but since this may not be so, it is better that the other should take place" [so also, characteristically, the Roman-Catholic Mack]: for it is not younger widows who have been taken into the catalogue, of whom he is speaking, but younger widows in general: Chrysostom's interpretation would make the Apostle contradict himself. The "therefore," on which Mack lays stress as favouring this meaning, simply infers from the temptations of young widows just described. There is no inconsistency here with the view expressed in 1 Cor. vii. 39, 40: the time and circumstances were different), bear children, govern households (i. e. in their place, and with their share of the duties), give no occasion (starting-point, in their behaviour or language) to the adversary (who is meant? Chrysostom and the ancients for the most part understand, the devil: see 1 Cor. xvi. 9; Phil. i. 28; and so, lately, Huther. But St. Paul's own usage of the word [also Tit. ii. 8] is our best guide. Ordinarily using it of human adversaries, he surely would here have mentioned the devil had he intended him. And the understanding him to be here meant brings in the next verse very awkwardly, as he there has an entirely new part assigned him. Understand, therefore, any adversary, Jew or Gentile, who may be on the watch to get occasion, by the lax conduct of the believers, to slander the Church) for [the sake of] reproach (to be joined with the word "occasion:" the occasion, when taken advantage of by the adversary, would be used for the sake of reproach, for the sake and purpose of reproaching the people of God). For already (he appeals to their experience) some (widows) have turned away (out of the right path) after (so as to follow) Satan (De Wette doubts whether St. Paul's experience could have been long enough to bear out such an assertion,—and thus impugns the genuineness of the Epistle. But this is very much a matter of dates: and even taking the earliest commonly assigned, the assertion might be strictly true, applying as it does not only to Ephesus, but to the far wider range of his apostolic ministry). <sup>16.]</sup> Not a repetition of vv. 4, 8, but an extension of the same duty to more distant relatives than those there spoken of. If any believing [man or] woman has widows (in [his or] her family—dependent in any degree, however distant—e.g. as sister, or sister-in-law, aunt, niece, cousin, &c.), let such person relieve them (see above, ver. 10), and let the church not be burdened (with their support); that it may relieve those who are widows in reality (really widowed—destitute of help).

<sup>17.]</sup> Let the presbyters who well preside (viz. over their portion of the Church's work: in earnestness and self-sacrifice, also with wisdom and ability) be held worthy of double (not, as compared with the widows, or the deacons, or the poor,—but as compared with those who have not distinguished themselves by presiding well; and evidently it is not to be taken in the mere literal sense of double, but implies increase generally—see below) honour (from other considerations, as well as from the context here, it is evident that not merely honour, but recompense is here in question: but the word need not be confined to that meaning: honour, and honour's fruit, may be both included in it. Grotius conceives an allusion to the double portion of the firstborn [Deut. xxi. 17]; Elsner, to the double share of provision which used to be set before the presbyters in the Agapæ. But as De Wette remarks, that practice was much more probably owing to a misunderstanding of this passage, especially those that labour in (the) word and teaching (therefore the preaching of the word, and teaching, was not the office of all the presbyters. Conybeare rightly remarks, that this is a proof of the early date of the Epistle. Of these two expressions the word would more properly express preaching; the doctrine, the work of instruction, by catechetical or other means).

<sup>18.]</sup> Ground for the above injunction.—See the first citation (an ox while treading, &c., not, 'the ox that treadeth,' &c., as A. V.) treated by the Apostle at more length, 1 Cor. ix. 9. It is doubted whether the words "the labourer is worthy of his hire," are a citation at all. Some have referred them to Lev. xix. 13: Deut. xxiv. 14, which passages however say nothing of the kind, being special directions about paying a labourer's wages before night. Theodoret and Theophylact suppose it to be quoted from the New Testament; i.e. from our Lord's saying, Matt. x. 10: Luke x. 7. But it is very unlikely that the Apostle should cite these under the title of the Scripture: and Calvin's view seems most probable, that "the Scripture saith" refers only to the former citation, and that he adduces this sentiment, as our Lord Himself does, as a popular and well-known saying.—This verse it is, which makes it extremely probable, that "ho-

<sup>19.</sup> See the summary above. Against a presbyter (those are certainly wrong who suppose that age, not office is again here indicated: the whole passage is of presbyters by office—compare ver. 22 below) entertain not an accusation, except on the word of (in the construction of the original, the accusation is represented as resting upon the testimony of these witnesses) two or three witnesses (De Wette asks,—but were not these required in every case, not only in that of a presbyter? Three answers are given: one, that accuracy in the number of the witnesses was to be strictly insisted on because false informations were prevalent; another, and so Calvin more at length: that Timothy was not constituted judge in private men's matters, only over the officers of the church in faults with which they might be charged as regarded the execution of their duty: a third, that a private man might by the law of Moses be cited with one witness only, not condemned; but that St. Paul prohibits the citing even of a presbyter without two or three. But this is manifestly a distinction without point—the receiving an accusation being used not of mere citation, but of entertaining the charge as a valid one: in other words, as including citation and conviction as well. The first reason seems the more probable: that he is only recalling the attention of Timothy to a known and prescribed precaution, which was in this case especially to be always observed).

<sup>20.</sup> [But] those who are doing wrong (if "but" is read, these are the sinning presbyters, and cannot well be any others. Without the "but," the application may be doubted) reprove in the presence of all (not all the presbyters, the "council of presbyters" see on what follows; but the whole congregation. Had it not been for ecclesiastical considerations, we should never have heard of such a limited meaning for the words before all), that the rest also (not, the other presbyters, which would have certainly been pointed out if intended,—but in its usual sense of 'the rest,' generally: the also seems to make this even plainer: that the warning may not be confined to a few, but may also spread over the whole church) may have fear (see Deut. xiii. 11: fear, on seeing the public disgrace consequent on sin).

<sup>21.</sup> I adjure thee in the presence of God, and of Christ Jesus (it has been supposed that, in the mention of "God and Christ Jesus," the Apostle refers to one Person only. But the whole construction, and the practice of St. Paul, is against the idea), and of the elect angels (the holy angels, who are the chosen attendants and ministers of God. Thus the word elect is an epithet distributed over the whole extent of the angels, not one designating any one class of angels above the rest. The designation is given in order to excite reverence on the part of Timothy:—"the angels, God's chosen ministers"), that thou keep these things (viz. the injunctions, vv. 19, 20) without prejudice (pre-judgment, previous condemnation before hearing a man's case), doing nothing according to partiality (bias towards, as the other was bias against, an accused presbyter. Theodoret says well: "He forbids two things: the condemning through trusting to the mere credit of accusers, or doing this same, through malice, without accurate enquiry: and, when the proofs are open and plain, deferring the condemnation, perverting justice through favour to the accused").

scandal just dealt with may be prevented: viz., by caution in ordaining at first. The reference is primarily to presbyters: of course extending also in its spirit to all other church offices. This reference, which is maintained by most Commentators, is denied by some others, who understand the command to refer to receiving back into the church excommunicated persons, or heretics, which from later testimonies they shew to have been the practice: Huther, rightly rejecting this idea, yet interprets it of laying on of hands as merely conveying ecclesiastical blessing on many various occasions. But surely this is too vague and unimportant for the solemn language here used. Regarding the whole, to ver. 25, as connected, and belonging to one subject, I cannot accept any interpretation but the obvious and ordinary one: see especially ch. iv. 14: 2 Tim. i. 6.—

Lay hands hastily on no one, nor be partaker in other men's sins (as he would do by being the means of negligently admitting into the ministry unfit and ungodly persons, being properly held responsible for the consequence of those bad habits of theirs which more care might have ascertained. The word sin points to the former expression, "them that sin"):—keep THYSELF (highly emphatic: not merely others over whom thou art called to preside and pronounce judgment in admitting them to the ministry. And the emphasis is peculiarly in place here, as applying to that which has just preceded. If he were to admit improper candidates to the ministry from bias or from negligence, his own character, by his becoming a partaker in their sins, would suffer: whatever thou doest therefore, be sure to maintain, by watchful care and caution, thyself above all stain of blame) pure (not here to be referred to personal purity and chastity, though that of course would be the most important of all elements in carrying out the precept: but as above).—No longer (habitually) drink water, but use a little wine, on account of thy stomach, and thy frequent illnesses

(the question, why this injunction is here inserted, has never been satisfactorily answered. Many take it as a modification of "keep thyself pure," so as to prevent it from being misunderstood as enjoining asceticism. But on our explanation of the words, and I may add on any worthy view of the context, such a connexion will at once be repudiated. Chrysostom has caught the right clue, when he says, "Timothy seems to me to have been generally an invalid: and this the Apostle shews when he says, &c. as here:" but he has not followed it up. Timothy was certainly of a feeble bodily frame, and this feebleness appears, from other hints which we have respecting him, to have affected his character. See especially 1 Cor. xvi. 10, 11, and note there. Is it not very possible, that such feebleness, and perhaps timidity, may have influenced him as an overseer of the church, and prevented that keen-sighted judgment and vigorous action which a bishop should ever shew in estimating the characters of those who are candidates for the ministry? If this was so, then it is quite natural that in advising him on this point, St. Paul should throw in a hint, in fatherly kindness, that he must not allow these maladies to interfere with the efficient discharge of his high office, but take all reasonable means of raising his bodily condition above them. I feel compelled to adopt this view, from the close connexion of the next verse with the whole preceding passage, and the exceedingly unnatural isolation of this, unless it bears such a reference).

24.] The same subject continued. If my view of the last verse is correct, the connexion will be found in the fact, that the conservation of himself in health and vigour would ensure his being able to deal ably and firmly with the cases which should come before him for decision. To guide him still further in this, the Apostle subjoins this remark, indicating two classes of characters with which he would have to deal in judging, whether favourably or unfavourably.—Of some men the sins (this

Their characters come before thee unanticipated by adverse rumour: but thou mayest by examination discover those flaws in their conduct which had been skilfully concealed—the sins which, so to speak, follow at their heels. Therefore be watchful, and do not let the mere non-existence of previous adverse rumour lead thee always to presume fitness for the sacred office). <sup>25.]</sup> So also (in like manner on the other side of men's conduct) the good works (of some) are openly manifest; and those [works] which are otherwise situated (which are not openly manifest) cannot be hidden (will come out, just as the sins in ver. 21, on examination. The tendency of this verse is to warn him against hasty condemnation, as the former had done against hasty approval. Sometimes thou wilt find a man's good character go before him, and at once approve him to thee; but where this is not so, do not therefore be rash to condemn—thou mayest on examination soon discover, if there really be any good deeds accompanying him: for they are things which cannot be hidden—the good tree, like the bad, will be known by its fruits, and that speedily, on enquiry).

connexion is very plain. I have endeavoured to indicate it as we pass on.

1.] Let as many as are bondmen under the yoke (I have adopted the rendering of De Wette and Luther, attaching "bondmen" to the predicate, as the simpler construction. The other arrangement, which is that of A. V., 'as many bondmen as are under the yoke,' making under the yoke emphatic as distinguishing either 1) those treated hardly, or 2) those who were under unbelieving masters, has undoubtedly something to be said for it, but does not seem to me so likely, from the arrangement of the words. I take then "bondmen under the yoke" as the predicate) hold their own ("their own," as in Eph. v. 22, and many other places, to bring out and emphasize the relation; see note there) masters worthy of all (fitting) honour, that the name of God and his doctrine (compare Tit. ii. 10, where, writing on the same subject, he admonishes slaves, "that they adorn the doctrine of our Saviour, even God, in all things") be not spoken evil of (Chrysostom gives the sense well: "The unbeliever, if he see his slaves conducting themselves insolently because they are Christians, will generally revile the doctrine of Christ as causing insubordination: but when he sees them subordinate, he will be more likely to be persuaded, and will give more attention to what is said" [by those who preach Christ]). This verse obviously applies only to those slaves who had unbelieving masters. This is brought out by the reason given, and by the contrast in the next verse, not by any formal opposition in terms. The account to be given of the absence of such opposition is, that this verse contains the general exhortation, the ease of Christian slaves under unbelieving masters being by far the more common. The exception is treated in the next verse). 2.] But (see

6.] He then goes off, on the mention of this erroneous view, to shew how it really stands with the Christian as to the desire of riches: its danger, and the mischief it has occasioned. But (although they are in error in thus thinking, there is a sense in which such an idea is true, for) godliness accompanied with contentment (see above, and Phil. iv. 11) is great (means of) gain (alluding, not to the Christian's reward in the next world,—but the [means of] gain is in the very fact of possessing piety joined with contentment, and thus being able to dispense with those things which we cannot carry away with us).

7.] Reason why this is so.—For we brought nothing into the world, because neither can we carry any thing out (the meaning appears to be,—we were appointed by God to come naked into the world, to teach us to remember that we must go naked out of it).

8.] But (contrast to the avaricious, who forget this, or knowing it do not act on it) having (if we have) food (sufficient for our continually recurring wants,—the needful

10.] For the root of all evils is the love of money (not, is the only root whence all evils spring: but is the root whence all [manner of] evils may and as matter of fact do arise. So that the objections to the sentiment have no force: for neither does it follow [1] that the covetous man cannot possibly retain any virtuous disposition,—nor [2] that there may not be other roots of evil besides covetousness: neither of these matters being in the Apostle's view), after which (love of money, Such inaccuracies are, however, often found in language, and we have examples of them in St. Paul elsewhere: e. g. "hope that is seen," Rom. viii. 24; see also Acts xxiv. 15), wandered away from the faith (ch. i. 19; iv. 1), and pierced themselves through with many pains (the pains being regarded as the weapons. "Lusts are thorns: and as among thorns, whenever one touches them, one's hands are bloodied and wounds made; so he who falls among lusts shall suffer the same, and shall surround his soul with griefs," Chrysostom).

11—16.] Exhortation and conjuration to Timothy, arising out of these considerations.

11.] But (contrast to "some" above) thou (emphatic), O man of God (the designation of prophets in the Old Test. Compare 1 Sam. ix. 6, 7, 8, 10, and hence perhaps used of Timothy as dedicated to God's service in the ministry: but also not without a solemn reference to that which it expresses, that God and not riches [see the contrast again ver. 17] is his object of desire), flee these things (love of money and its accompanying evils); but (the contrast is to the following these things, underlying the mention of them. We must say and in English) follow after (see 2 Tim. here, where both words occur again) righteousness, godliness (so Tit. ii. 12), faith (not mere rectitude in keeping trust, for all these words regard the Christian life), love, patience (under afflictions: stedfast endurance), meek-spiritedness (these two last qualities have reference to his behaviour towards the opponents of the Gospel).

12.] Strive the good strife (so literally: see ch. i. 18: 2 Tim. iv. 7: 1 Cor. ix. 24 ff.: Phil. iii. 12) of the faith (not 'of faith,' abstract and subjective: but that noble conflict which the faith,—the profession of the soldier of Christ, entails on him), lay hold upon (as the aim and object of the life-long struggle; the prize to be gained: so that the second imperative is not the mere result of the first, but correlative with it and contemporaneous: 'strive . . . , and while doing so, endeavour to attain.') eternal life, to which thou wast called (here apparently the image is dropped, and the realities of the Christian life are spoken of. Some have supposed an allusion to the athletes being summoned by a herald: but it seems far-fetched—and indeed inaccurate: for it was to the contest, not to the prize, that they were thus summoned), and didst confess the good confession (of faith in Christ: the confession, which every servant of Christ must make, on taking upon himself His service, or professing it when called upon so to do. There is some uncertainty, to what occasion the Apostle here refers; whether to the baptism of Timothy: to his ordination as a minister: to his appointment over the church at Ephesus: or, to some confession made by him under persecution. Of these the first appears to me most probable, as giving the most general sense to "the good confession," and applying best to the immediate consideration of eternal life, which is the common object of all Christians) before many witnesses.

13.] I command thee (ch. i. 3) in the presence of God, who endueth all things with life

(there is most probably a reference to "eternal life" above: hardly, as Chrysostom and others think, to the resurrection, reminding him that death for Christ's sake was not to be feared: for there is here no immediate allusion to danger, but only to the duty of personal firmness in the faith in his own religious life), and of Christ Jesus, who testified (the Lord testified the confession, sealed it with His sufferings and blood,—Timothy was to confess it) before Pontius Pilate (this may be rendered as in the Apostles' Creed, "under Pontius Pilate:" but the immediate reference here being to His confession, it seems more natural to take the meaning, "in the presence of;" and so Chrysostom, who as a Greek, and familiar with the Creed, is a fair witness) the good confession (viz. that whole testimony to the verity of his own Person and to the Truth, which we find in John xviii., and which doubtless formed part of the oral apostolic teaching. Those who render the preposition, "under," understand this confession of our Lord's sufferings and death—which at least is far-fetched.—There is no necessity to require a strict parallel between the circumstances of the confession of our Lord and that of Timothy, nor to infer in consequence of this verse that his confession must have been one before a heathen magistrate: it is the fact of a confession having been made in both cases that is put in the foreground—and that our Lord's was made in the midst of danger and with death before him, is a powerful argument to firmness for his servant in his own confession); that thou keep (preserve) the commandment (used not to designate any special command just given, but as a general compendium of the rule of the Gospel, after which our lives and thoughts must be regulated: see "the commandment" in the same sense, ch. i. 5) without spot and without reproach (both epithets belong to the commandment, not to thee, as most Commentators. The commandment, entrusted to thee as a deposit [ver. 20], must be kept by thee unstained and unapproached, until the appearance of our Lord Jesus Christ ("that is," says Chrysostom, "until thy death, until thy departure." But surely both the usage of the word appearance (epiphany) and the next verse should have kept him from this mistake. Far better Bengel, explaining that the faithful then set before themselves the coming of the Lord: we, the hour of our death. We may fairly say that whatever impression is betrayed by the words that the coming of the Lord would be in Timothy's lifetime, is chastened and corrected by the words "in His own seasons" of the next verse. That, the certainty of the coming in God's own time, was a fixed truth respecting which the Apostle speaks with the authority of the Spirit: but the day and hour was hidden from him as from us: and from such passages as this we see that the apostolic age maintained that which ought to be the attitude of all ages, constant expectation of the Lord's return): <sup>15</sup> which in His own seasons ("that is, in the fitting, proper seasons," Chrysostom. Bengel remarks the plural, which seems to imply long spaces of time. See the same in Acts i. 7) He shall manifest (make visible, cause to appear; display), (who is) the blessed (blessed, of Himself) and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords (literally, the King of them that reign and the Lord of them that rule. This seems the place,—on account of this same designation occurring in Rev. xvii. 14; xix. 16, applied to our Lord,—to enquire whether these verses 15, 16 are said of the Father or of the Son. Chrysostom holds very strongly the latter view: but surely the term "in His own seasons," compared with "the seasons which the Father hath kept in His own power," Acts i. 7, determines for the former: so also does "whom never man saw, &c." verse 16, which Chrysostom leaves untouched; who only hath immortality (Justin Martyr says, "God is said only to have immortality, because He hath it not by the will of another, as the rest who possess it, but of His own proper essence"), dwelling in light unapproachable, whom no one of men [ever] saw, nor can see (these words, as compared with John i. 18, seem to prove decisively that the whole description applies to the Father, not to the Son): to whom be honour and eternal might. Amen (see ch. i. 17, where a similar ascription occurs). Some of the Commentators think that verses 15, 16 are taken from an ecclesiastical hymn: and some have even arranged it metrically. See ch. iii. 16, 2 Tim. ii. 11 ft., notes.

17—19.] Precepts for the rich.—Not a supplement to the Epistle, as commonly regarded: the occurrence of a doxology is no sufficient ground for supposing that the Apostle intended to close with it: compare ch. i. 17. Rather, the subject is resumed from verses 6—10. We may perhaps make an inference as to the late date of the Epistle, from the existence of wealthy members in the Ephesian church.

17.] To those who are rich in this present world (Chrysostom tries to bring out a distinction between those that were rich in this world, and those that were rich in the next. But such a distinction would have been improbable, as drawing a line between the two characters, which it is the object of the exhortation to keep united in the same persons. See the distinction in Luke xii. 21), command not to be highminded ("this he enjoins, knowing that nothing so much engenders pride, and insolence, and assumption, as riches." Chrysostom), nor to set their hope (i. e. to have hoped, and continue to be hoping: see on ch. iv. 10) on the uncertainty of riches (not the same as "on uncertain riches," but far more forcible, hyperbolically representing the hope as reposed on the very quality in riches which least justifies it), but in God, who affordeth us all things richly ("riches" of a nobler and higher kind are included in His bounty: that desire of riches which is a bane and snare in its worldly sense, will be far better attained in the course of His abundant mercies to them who hope in Him. And even those who would be wealthy without Him are in fact only made rich by His bountiful hand) for enjoyment (for the purpose of enjoying);—to do good ('to practise benevolence,' as Conybeare), to be rich in good works (honourable deeds),—to be free givers, ready contributors, [by this means] laying up for themselves as a treasure (hoarding up, not uncertain treasure for the life here, but a substantial pledge of that real and endless life which shall be hereafter. future, that (in order that, as always: not the mere result of the preceding: 'as it were,' says De Wette, 'setting foot on this foundation,' or firm ground) they may lay hold of (ver. 12) that which is really life (not merely the goods of this life, but the possession and substance of that other, which, as full of joy and everlasting, is the only true life).

20, 21.] CONCLUDING EXHORTATION TO TIMOTHY. O Timothy (this personal address comes with great weight and solemnity: "he names him, as his son, with solemnity and love." Bengel), keep the deposit (entrusted to thee: 2 Tim. i. 12, 14. "Take not aught from it: it is not thine: thou wert trusted with others' goods, deteriorate them not." Chrysostom, —viz., the sound doctrine which thou art to teach in thy ministry in the Lord, compare Col. iv. 17. This is the most probable explanation. Some regard it as the commandment above, ver. 14: some as meaning the grace given to him for his office, or for his own spiritual life: but ch. i. 18, compared with 2 Tim. ii. 2, seems to fix the meaning as above), turning away from (compare 2 Tim. iii. 5) the profane babblings (empty discourses: so also 2 Tim. ii. 16) and oppositions (apparently, dialectic antitheses and niceties of the false teachers) of that which is falsely named ("for without being faith, it cannot be knowledge." Chrysostom) knowledge (the true Gnosis [knowledge], being one of the greatest gifts of the Spirit to the Church, was soon counterfeited by various systems of hybrid theology, calling themselves by this honoured name. In the Apostle's time, the misnomer was already current: but we are not therefore justified in assuming that it had received so definite an application, as afterwards it did to the various forms of Gnostic heresy. All that we can hence gather is, that the true spiritual Gnosis of the Christian was already being counterfeited by persons bearing the characteristics noticed in this Epistle. Whether these were the Gnostics themselves, or their precursors, we have examined in the Introduction to the Pastoral Epistles):

21.] which (the falsely called knowledge) some professing (ch. ii. 10) missed the mark (the word is used of one shooting and missing. The tense is the indefinite past, as marking merely the event, not the abiding of these men still in the Ephesian church) concerning the faith.

22.] CONCLUDING BENEDICTION: [The] grace (of God,—the grace for which we Christians look, and in which we stand) be with thee.—In the A. V. a subscription to the Epistle is found, "The first to Timothy was written from Laodicea, which is the chiefest city of Phrygia Pacatiana." A shorter notice, "from Laodicea," is found in the Alexandrine MS. These owe their origin probably to the notion that this was the Epistle from Laodicea mentioned Col. iv. 16. The further addition in the A. V. betrays a date subsequent to the fourth century, when the province of Phrygia Pacatiana was first created.

according to (in pursuance of, with a view to the fulfilment of) the promise of life, which is in Christ Jesus (all this is to be taken with the word Apostle, not as following the will of God. Theodoret explains it well, "So that I proclaim to men the eternal life which hath been promised." Chrysostom sees, in this mention of the promise of life in Christ, a consolation to Timothy under present troubles. And this idea seems to be borne out by the strain of the subsequent portion of the Epistle, which is throughout one of confirmation and encouragement).

2. my beloved child] "Can it be accidental," says Mack, "that instead of 'my true child,' as Timothy is called in the 1st Epistle, i. 2, and Titus i. 4,—here we have 'my beloved child?' Or may a reason for the change be found in this, that it now behoved Timothy to stir up afresh the faith and the grace in him, before he could again be worthy of the name true (genuine) in its full sense?" This may be too much pressed: but certainly there is throughout this Epistle an altered tone with regard to Timothy—more of mere love, and less of confidence, than in the former: and this would naturally shew itself even in passing words of address. To find in the word "beloved" more confidence, as some do, can hardly be correct: the expression of feeling is different in kind, not comparable in degree: suiting an Epistle of warm affection and somewhat saddened reminding, rather than one of rising hope and confidence. I regret to be, on this point, at issue throughout this second Epistle, with my friend Bishop Ellicott, who seems to me too anxious to rescue the character of Timothy from the slightest imputation of weakness: thereby marring the delicate texture of many of St. Paul's characteristic periods, in which tender reproof, vigorous reassurance, and fervent affection are exquisitely intermingled.

be found in the following mention of the faith of the mother and grandmother of Timothy, which was already in the Apostle's mind. We may observe that he does not, as some have supposed, place on the same ground the Jewish and Christian service of God: but simply asserts what he had before asserted, Acts xxiii. 1, xxiv. 14,—that his own service of God had been at all times conscientious and single-hearted, and that he had received it as such from his forefathers) in pure conscience, how unceasing I make my mention (or, have remembrance, which in English, joined with the fact of its being in his prayers, amounts to the same thing) of thee in my prayers night and day; longing to see thee, remembering thy tears (shed at our parting), that I may be filled with joy (the expressions in this verse are assurances of the most fervent personal love, strengthened by the proof of such love having been reciprocal. From these he gently and most skilfully passes to a tone of fatherly exhortation and reproof); calling to remembrance the unfeigned faith [which was] (Ellicott objects to 'was,' and would render 'is;' see note above on ver. 2. But I do not see how St. Paul could be said to call to remembrance a thing then present. Surely the remembrance is of the time when they parted, and the faith then existing. See more below) in thee (there is perhaps a slight reproach in this mention of the faith in him as a matter of remembrance, as if it were a thing once certain as fact, and as matter of memory, but now only, as below, resting on a persuasion; and in presence of such a possible inference, and of the word remembrance, I have ventured therefore to render, 'which was in thee,' viz. at the time of the tears being shed,—its present existence being only by and by introduced as a confident hope), such as dwelt first (before it dwelt in thee) in thy grandmother Lois (not elsewhere mentioned), and thy mother Eunice ("Timothy, the son of a believing Jewish woman, but of a Greek father," Acts xvi. 1: see also ch. iii. 15. Both these were probably converts on St. Paul's former visit to Lystra, Acts xiv. 6 ff.); but (gives the meaning 'notwithstanding appearances.' It is entirely missed by Ellicott, and not fairly rendered in the A. V., 'and;' see note below) I am persuaded that (supply "it dwelleth") also in thee (there is undoubtedly a want of entire confidence here expressed; and such a feeling will account for the mention of the faith of his mother and grandmother, to which, if he wavered, he was proving untrue. This was felt by several of the ancient Commentators).

6—14.] Exhortation to Timothy to be firm in the faith, and not to shrink from suffering: enforced (9—11) by the glorious character of the Gospel, and free mercy of God in it, and (11—13) by his own example. For which cause (viz. because thou hast inherited, didst once possess, and I trust still dost possess, such unfeigned faith; "being persuaded this of thee") I put thee in mind to stir up (literally, to rekindle into a flame: but the metaphorical use of the word was so common, that there is hardly need to recur to its literal sense) the gift of God (gift, singular, as combining the whole of the gifts necessary for the ministry in one aggregate: not 'the gift of the Spirit imparted to all believers;' see 1 Tim. iv. 14, note. Of those ministerial gifts, that of boldness would be most required in this case. Bengel says, "Timothy seems, in Paul's long absence, to have somewhat declined: certainly he is now stimulated to greater efforts"), which is in thee by means of the laying on of my hands (these words, especially when compared with 1 Tim. iv. 14, mark the sense of the word gift to be as above, and not the general gifts of the Spirit which followed the laying on of hands after baptism. Any apparent discrepancy with that passage, from the Apostle here speaking of the laying on of his own hands alone, may be removed by regarding the Apostle as chief in the ordination, and the presbytery as his assistants, as is the case with Bishops at the present day. As to the attributing the gift to the laying on of hands as its agent, we can only appeal, against the Roman-Catholic expositors, to the whole spirit of St. Paul's teaching, as declaring that by such an expression he does not mean that the inward spiritual grace is operated merely and barely by the outward visible sign,—but is only asserting, in a mode of speech common to us all, that the solemn dedication by him of Timothy to God's work, of which the laying on of his hands was the sign and seal, did bring with it gifts and grace for that work. In this sense, and in this alone, the gift came through the laying on of hands, that laying on being the concentrated and effective sign of the setting apart, and conveying in faith the answer, assumed by faith, to the prayers of the church. That the Apostle had authority thus to set apart, was necessary to the validity of the act, and thus to the reception of the grace:—but the authority did not convey the grace. I may just add that the 'indelibility of orders,' which Mack infers from this passage, is simply and directly refuted by it. If the gift which was in him required stirring up, if, as Chrysostom says, "it is in us to quench it, and to re-light it,"—then plainly it is not indelible).

7.] For ('and there is reason for my thus exhorting thee, seeing that thou hast shewn a spirit inconsistent with the character of that gift.' The particle is passed over by Ellicott) God did not give (when we were admitted to the ministry: not, 'hath not given,' as A. V., which loses the reference) us the spirit (not "a spirit:" see my Greek Test.) of cowardice (there is doubtless a touch of severity in the use of this word, putting before Timothy his timidity in such a light as to shame him); but (the spirit) of power (as opposed to the weakness implied in cowardice), and love (as opposed to that false compliance with men, which shrinks from bold rebuke:—that lofty self-abandonment of love for others, which will even sacrifice repute, and security, and all that belongs to self, in the noble struggle to do men good), and correction (the original meaning of the word 'admonition of others that they may become sound-minded,'—must be retained, as necessary both on account of usage, and on account of the context. It is this bearing bold testimony before others, from which Timothy appears to have shrunk: compare ver. 8. The word in after times became a common one for discipline or ecclesiastical correction. The making the word mean a sound mind, as A. V. and many Commentators, is surely not allowable, though Chrysostom puts it doubtfully as an alternative. The only way in which it can come virtually to that, is by supposing the correction to be exercised by ourselves over ourselves. But this does not seem to me to suit the context so well as the meaning given above).

8.] Be not then (seeing that God gave us such a Spirit, not the other) ashamed of (for construction see ref. The caution would not of necessity imply that Timothy had already shewn such a feeling: but it would be just in keeping with the delicate tact of the Apostle, to use such form of admonition, when in fact the blame had been already partly incurred. See note on ver. 1) the testimony of our Lord (i. e. the testimony which thou art to give concerning our Lord, genitive objective: not 'the testimony which He bore,' genitive subjective. The our in "our Lord" is inserted because being about to introduce himself, he binds by this word Timothy and himself together), nor of me His prisoner (I would hardly say, with some Commentators, that this refers only to the services which the Apostle expected from Timothy in coming to him at Rome: such thought may have been in his mind, and may have mingled with his motive in making the exhortation; but I believe the main reference to be to his duty as upholding St. Paul and his teaching in the face of personal danger and persecution. It is impossible to deny that the above personal reference does enter again and again: but I cannot believe it to be more than secondary. On the expression "His prisoner," see Eph. iii. 1 note: the genitive implies not possession, but the reason for which he was imprisoned, compare Philem. 13, "the bonds of the Gospel"); but suffer hardship with me for the Gospel (this extends the sphere of his fellow-suffering with the Apostle beyond his mere visiting Rome) according to the power of God (what power? that which God has manifested in our salvation, as described below [gen. subj.], or that which God imparts to us [gen. obj.],—God's power, or the power which we get from God? On all grounds, the former seems to be the juster and worthier sense: the former, as implying indeed the latter à fortiori—that God, who by His strong hand and mighty arm has done all this for us, will help us through all trouble incurred for Him); who saved us (all believers: there is no reason for limiting this us to Paul and Timothy. What follows is in the strictest coherence. 'Be not cowardly nor ashamed of the Gospel, but join me in endurance on its behalf, according to God's power, who has given such proofs of that power and of its exercise towards us, in saving us,—calling us in Christ,—destroying death—&c., of which endurance I am an example [11—13]—which example do thou follow' [13, 14]), and called us (this, as indeed the whole context, shews that it is the Father who is spoken of: see note on Gal. i. 6), with an holy (the word calling expressing the state, rather than merely the summoning into it [as does 'vocation' also], and holy is its quality) calling (see Eph. iv. 1; i. 18: Rom. viii. 28—30, and notes), not according to (after the measure of, in accordance with) our works, but according to (after the measure of, in pursuance of) his own purpose (i.e., "none compelling Him, none counselling with Him, but of His own purpose; moving from His own will, out of His goodness." Chrysostom), and (according to) the grace which was given to us (this expression, which properly belongs only to an actual imparting, is used, because that which God determines in Eternity, is as good as already accomplished in time. No weakening of given into predestined must be thought of) in Christ Jesus (as its element and condition, see Eph. i. 4; iii. 11) before eternal times ("that is, from eternity." Chrysostom. It is hardly possible in the presence of Scripture analogy to take this expression as meaning 'during the Jewish dispensation:' still less, that 'the scheme of redemption was arranged by God immediately after the fall, before any ages or dispensations.' Even Calvin's interpretation, "the perpetual series of years since the foundation of the world," fails in reaching the full meaning. In the parallel, Rom. xvi. 25, the mystery of redemption is described as having been "kept silent during eternal times"—which obviously includes ages previous to the foundation of the world, as well as after it;—see Eph. iii. 11, compared with i. 4: 1 Cor. ii. 7), but (contrast to the concealment from eternity in the manifestation in time) manifested now (see Col. i. 26; Tit. i. 3) by the appearing (in the flesh. The original word, epiphaneia, is here only used thus: still it does not refer to the birth only, but to the whole manifestation) of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who abolished [indeed] death (compare especially 1 Cor. xv. 26. By the death of Christ, Death has lost his sting, and is henceforth of no more account: consequently the mere act of natural death is evermore treated by the Lord Himself and His Apostles as of no account: see John xi. 26; Rom. viii. 2, 38; 1 Cor. xv. 55; Heb. ii. 14: and its actual and total abolition foretold, Rev. xxi. 4. Death must be kept here to its literal sense, and its spiritual only so far understood, as involved in the other. The delivering from the fear of death is manifestly not to the purpose), but (contrast to the gloom involved in death) brought to light (threw light upon, and thus made visible what was before hidden) life (i.e. the new and glorious life of the Spirit, begun here below and enduring for ever: the only life worthy of being so called), and incorruptibility (immortality—of the new life, not merely of the risen body: that is not in question here, but is, though a glorious yet only a secondary consequence of this incorruptibility; see Rom. viii. 11) by means of the (preaching of the) Gospel (which makes these glorious things known to men. These words are better taken as belonging only to “brought life and incorruption to light,” not to “abolished death.” For this former, the abolition of death, is an absolute act of Christ, the latter a manifestation to those who see it): for which (viz. the Gospel, the publication of this good news to men) I was appointed an herald, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles (see the same expression, and note, in

1 Tim. ii. 7. The connexion in which he here introduces himself is noticed above, on ver. 8. It is to bring in his own example and endurance in sufferings, and grounds of trust, for a pattern to Timothy): on which account (viz. because I was appointed, as above) I also (besides doing the active work of such a mission) am suffering these things (viz. the things implied in the term “His prisoner,” ver. 8, and further specified by way of explanation and encouragement to Timothy below, ver. 15): but I am not ashamed (compare the command “Be not ashamed,” ver. 8): for I know whom I have trusted (hardly to be formally expressed so strongly as De Wette, “in whom I have put my trust,” though the meaning, in the spiritual explanation, is virtually the same: the metaphor here is that of a pledge deposited, and the depositor trusting the depositary: and it is best to keep to the figure. The reference is to God, as Tit. iii. 8; Acts xxvii. 25?), and am persuaded that He is able to keep my deposit (so literally. But how are the words to be taken,—and what is meant by them? Does my import, the deposit which He has entrusted to me, or the deposit which I have entrusted to Him? Let us consider the latter first. What is there which the Apostle can be said to have entrusted to God? Some say, (a) his eternal reward, the crown laid up for him, ch. iv. 8: but then we should have this reward represented as a matter not of God’s free grace, but of his own, delivered to God to keep: (b) his soul, as in 1 Pet. iv. 19: Luke xxiii. 46 [see this treated below]: (c) his salvation [see below]: (d) the believers who had been converted by his means, which hardly needs refutation, as altogether unsupported by the context. Then, under the former head, which would make my possessive,—that which He has committed to me, and which is my deposit to be guarded by me,—we have the following meanings assigned:—(e) the Holy Sp.rit. So Theodoret: (f) the faith and its proclamation to the world. So Chrysostom, as an alternative: (g) the apostolic office which the Apostle regarded as a thing entrusted to him, a stewardship, 1 Cor. ix. 17: (h) the faithful who had been converted by him in the view of their having been committed to him by Christ: (i) his own soul, as entrusted to him by God. On all these, and this view of the deposit generally, I may remark that we may fairly be guided by the same words “the trust which was committed to thee, keep” in ver. 14 as to their sense here. As, in ver. 14, these words are said of the subject of the sentence, viz. Timothy, keeping a deposit entrusted to him,—so here they must be said of the subject of the sentence, viz. God, keeping a deposit entrusted to Him. Otherwise, while keeping the mere word deposit to the same formal meaning in both places, we shall, most harshly and unnaturally, be requiring the phrase to bear, in two almost consecutive verses, two totally different meanings. The analogy therefore of ver. 14, makes the second group of meanings entirely against it, and in fact necessitates the adoption of the first alternative, viz. the objective genitive,—and the deposit committed by the Apostle to God. And when we enquire what this deposit was, we have the reply, I conceive, in the previous words whom I have trusted. He had entrusted HIMSELF, body, soul, and spirit, to the keeping of his heavenly Father, and lay safe in his hands, confident of His abiding and effectual care. A strong confirmation of this view is gained from 1 Thess. v. 23. In an English version, it is necessary to adopt one or other of the alternatives, for the sake of perspicuity. I have therefore retained the words of the A. V.) against (in a temporal sense: not simply ‘until’) that day (viz. the day of Christ’s appearing; see especially ch. iv. 8).

words in reference to the context. On the right appreciation of this depends the question whether they are to be taken in their strict meaning, and simple grammatical sense, or to be forced to some possible but far-fetched rendering. The consideration depends very much on the collocation and meaning of the words in the original, and can hardly be represented to the English reader. I have argued in my Greek Testament that the ordinary rendering as in A. V., “Hold fast the form of sound words,” is absolutely untenable. The verb does not mean “hold fast,” but is simply “have,” or “take,” and it is not “the form,” but “a form,” or “a sample.” This being so, we shall have the rendering so far,—Have (take) an example of (the) sound words, which thou heardest of me in faith and love which are in Christ Jesus. Then two questions arise for us: to what (1) does take an example refer? I answer,—to the saying immediately preceding, “I know whom I have trusted,” &c. This was one of those faithful or wholesome sayings, of which we hear so often in these Epistles; one which in his timidity, Timothy was perhaps in danger of forgetting, and of which therefore the Apostle reminds him, and bids him take it as a specimen or pattern of those sound words which had been committed to him by his father in the faith. To what (2) do the words in faith and love which are in Christ Jesus refer? Certainly not to the words “from me,” meaning “those sound words which I spake to thee concerning, versed in, faith and love,” &c.: not, again, to the command “have,” or “take,” to which in our understanding of it, such a qualification would be altogether inapplicable: but to thou heardest, reminding Timothy of the readiness of belief, and warmth of affection, with which he had at first received the wholesome words from the mouth of the Apostle, and thus tacitly reproaching him for his present want of growth in that faith and love; as if it had been said, Let me in thus speaking, ‘I know whom I have believed, &c.’ call to thy mind, by one example, those faithful sayings, those words goodly deposit keep through the Holy Spirit who dwelleth in us (not thee and me merely, but all believers: compare Acts xiii. 52).

<sup>15—18.]</sup> Notices of the defective adherence of certain brethren. These notices are intimately connected with what has preceded. He has held up to Timothy, as an example, his own boldness and constancy: and has given him a sample of the faithful sayings which ruled his own conduct, in ver. 12. He proceeds to speak of a few of the discouragements under which in this confidence he was bearing up: and, affectionate gratitude prompting him, and at the same time by way of an example of fidelity to Timothy, he dilates on the exception to the general dereliction of him which had been furnished by Onesiphorus.—Thou knowest this, that all who are in Asia (it does not follow, as Chrysostom says, that “it was probable that there were then present in Rome many from divers parts of Asia:” but he uses the expression with reference to him to whom he was writing, who was in the proconsular Asia) turned away from me (not as A. V., “are turned away from me” [perfect]: the act referred to took place at a stated time, and from what follows, that time appears to have been on occasion of a visit to Rome. They were ashamed of Paul the prisoner, and did not seek him out, see ch. iv. 16:

“they avoided the society of the Apostle from fear of Nero,” Theodoret: but perhaps not so much from this motive, as from the one hinted at in the praise of Onesiphorus below. The all must of course apply to all of whom the Apostle had had trial [and not even those without exception, vv. 16—18]: the A. V. gives the idea, that a general apostasy of all in Asia from St. Paul had taken place. On ASIA, i. e. the proconsular Asia, see note, Acts xvi. 6); of whom are (this is hardly to be pressed as indicating that at the present moment Phygelus and Hermogenes were in Rome and were shunning him: it merely includes them in the class just mentioned) Phygelus and Hermogenes (why their names are specially brought forward, does not appear. Suetonius mentions a certain Hermogenes of Tarsus, who was put to death by Domitian).

<sup>16.]</sup> May the Lord give mercy (an expression not found elsewhere in the New Test.) to the house of Onesiphorus (from this expression, here and in ch. iv. 19, and from what follows, ver. 18, it has been not improbably supposed, that Onesiphorus himself was no longer living at this time. Some indeed take it as merely an extension of the gratitude of the Apostle from Onesiphorus to his household: but ch. iv. 19 is against this. Theodoret indeed and Chrysostom understand that Onesiphorus was with him at this time: but the words here [e. g., when he came to Rome] will hardly allow that), because on many occasions he refreshed me (any kind of refreshing, of body or mind, may be implied), and was not ashamed of (ver. 8) my chain (my condition of a prisoner): but when he came to Rome, sought me out the more diligently (he did not shrink 18.] May the Lord grant to him to find mercy from the Lord (the account to be given of the double "the Lord"—"the Lord," here is simply this—that "may the Lord grant" had become so completely a formula, that the recurrence was not noticed. This is far better than to suppose the second "Lord" merely to mean "Himself," or to enter into theological distinctions between "the Lord" as the Father, and "from the Lord" as from the Son, the Judge) in that day (see on ver. 12): and how many services he did (to me: or, to the saints: the general expression will admit of either) in Ephesus (being probably an Ephesian, compare ch. ix. 19), thou knowest better than I (because Timothy was at Ephesus, and was more conversant with matters there).

CH. II. 1-26.] Exhortations to Timothy, founded on the foregoing examples and warnings.

1.] Thou therefore (the command follows, primarily on his own example just propounded, and secondarily on that of Onesiphorus, in contrast to those who had been ashamed of and deserted him), my child, be strengthened (the original indicates an abiding state, not a mere insulated act, go on gaining strength) in the grace which is in Christ Jesus (more than "by the grace of Christ Jesus:" the grace which is laid up in Christ, the empowering influence in the Christian life, being necessary for its whole course and progress, is regarded as the element in which it is lived: to grow, 2 Pet. ult. Grace must not be taken, with some Commentators, for his ministerial office). And the things which thou heardest from me with many witnesses (i.e. with the intervention or attestation of many witnesses. These witnesses are not, as Chrysostom and others hold, the congregations whom Timothy had heard the Apostle teaching, nor are they testimonies from the law and prophets: nor the other Apostles: much less the Christian martyrs: but the presbyters and others present at his ordination, compare 1 Tim. iv. 14; vi. 12; and ch. i. 6), these deliver in trust (see above ch. i. 14) to faithful men (i.e. not merely 'believers,' but 'trustworthy men,' men who will "keep the goodly trust committed to them"), such as shall be (not merely 'are,' but 'shall be'—give every hope of turning out) able to teach them to others also (also carries the mind on to a further step of the same process—implying 'in their turn.' These "others" would be other trustworthy men like themselves).—The connexion of this verse with the foregoing and the following has been questioned. I believe it to be this: 'The true keeping of the deposit entrusted to thee will involve thy handing it on unimpaired to others, who may in their turn hand it on again. But in order to this, thou must be strong in grace—thou must be a fellow-sufferer with me in hardships —thou must strive lawfully—thou must not be entangled with this life's matters.' So that ver. 2 serves to prepare him to hear of the necessity of endurance and faithful adhesion to his duty as a Christian soldier, considering that he has his deposit not only to keep, but to deliver down unimpaired.—It is obviously a perversion of the sense to regard this verse as referring merely to his journey to Rome—that during that time he should, &c.: the future, shall be able, and the very contemplation of a similar step on the part of these men at a future time, are against such a supposition.—Mack constructs a long argument out of this verse to shew that there are two sources of Christian instruction in the Church, written teaching and oral, and ends with affirming that those who neglect the latter for the former, have always shewn that they in reality set up their own opinion above all teaching. But he forgets that these two methods of teaching are in fact but one and the same. Scripture has been God's way of fixing tradition, and rendering it trustworthily at any distance of time; of obviating the very danger which in this Epistle we see so imminent, viz. of one of those teachers, who were links in this chain of transmission, becoming inefficient and transmitting it inadequately. This very Epistle is therefore a warning to us not to trust oral tradition, seeing that it was so dependent on men, and to accept no way of conserving it but that which God's providence has pointed out to us in the canonical books of Scripture.

3.] Suffer hardship with me ("me" is not expressed in the Greek. The word signifies, as Conybeare happily renders it, 'Take thy share in suffering.' The mention of the share binds it to what precedes and follows, referring primarily to the Apostle himself, though doubtless having a wider reference to all who similarly suffer: see above, on the connexion of ver. 2) as a good soldier of Jesus Christ.

4.] No soldier when on service is (suffers himself to be: 'is,' as his normal state) entangled in the businesses of life; that he may please him who called him to be a soldier (who originally enrolled him as a soldier: the word signifies to levy soldiers, or raise a troop, and "he who chose him to be a soldier," designates the commander of such troop.—The taking of these precepts according to the letter, to signify that no minister of Christ may have a secular occupation, is quite beside the purpose: for 1) it is not ministers, but all soldiers of Christ who are spoken of: 2) the position of the verb shews that it is not the fact of the existence of such occupation, but the being entangled in it, which is before the Apostle's mind: 3) the Apostle's own example sufficiently confutes such an idea. Only then does it become unlawful, when such occupation, from its engrossing the man, becomes a hindrance to the work of the ministry,—or from its nature is incompatible with it).

5.] The soldier must serve on condition of not dividing his service: now we have another instance of the same requirement: and in the conflicts of the arena there are certain laws, without the fulfilment of which no man can obtain the victory. But (the above is not the only example, but) if any one also (i.e., to give another instance) strive in the games (it is necessary to adopt a circumlocution for the verb used, "be an athlete." That of A. V., 'strive for masteries,' is not definite enough, omitting all mention of the games, and by consequence not even suggesting them to the ordinary reader), he is not crowned (even in case of his gaining the victory? or is the word inclusive of all efforts made to get the crown,—'he has no chance of the crown?' rather the former), unless he have striven (this seems to assume the getting of the victory) lawfully (according to the prescribed conditions not merely of the contest, but of the preparation also). 6.]

Another comparison shewing the necessity of active labour as an antecedent to reward. The husbandman who is engaged in labour (who is actually employed in gathering in the fruit) ought first to partake of the fruits (which he is gathering in: the whole result of his ministry, not here further specified. The saying is akin to that of not muzzling the ox while treading out the corn:—the right of first participation in the harvest belongs to him who is labouring in the field: do not thou therefore, by relaxing this labour, forfeit that right. By this rendering, keeping strictly to the sense of the present participle, all difficulty as to the position of the word "first" is removed). 7.]

Understand what I say (i.e. as I have adduced several examples, have an intelligent understanding of them); for the Lord (Christ) shall give thee clear apprehension in all things (i.e. thou art well able to penetrate the meaning and bearing of what I say: for thou art not left to thyself, but hast the wisdom which is of Christ to guide thee. There is perhaps a slight intimation that he might apply to this fountain of wisdom more than he did:—'the Lord, if thou seekest it from Him').

8—13.] This statement and substantiation of two of the leading facts of the gospel, seems, especially as connected with the exhortations which follow on it vv. 14 ff., to be aimed at the false teachers by whose assumption Timothy was in danger of being daunted. The Incarnation and Resurrection of Christ were two truths especially imperilled, and indeed denied, by their teaching. At the same time these very truths, believed and persisted in, furnished him with the best grounds for steadfastness in his testimony to the Gospel, and attachment to the Apostle himself, suffering for his faithfulness to them: and on his adherence to these truths depended his share in that Saviour in whom they were manifested, and in union with whom, in His eternal and unchangeable truth, our share in blessedness depends. Keep in remembrance Jesus Christ, raised from the dead, of the seed of David (the abrupt, and otherwise unaccountable sequence of these clauses, has been supposed to spring from their being parts of a recognized and technical profession of faith), according to my Gospel ('the Gospel entrusted to me to teach.' Here the expression may seem to be used with reference to the false teachers, —but as in the other places it has no such reference, I should rather incline to regard it as a solemn way of speaking, identifying these truths with the preaching which had been the source of Timothy's belief), in which (i.e. in the service of which; in proclaiming which) I suffer hardship (see ver. 3), even unto (i.e. as far as to the endurance of) chains (see ch. i. 16) as a malefactor; but the word of God is not bound ("my hands are bound, but not my tongue," Chrysostom. But we shall better, though this reference to himself is not precluded [compare ch. iv. 17: Acts xxviii. 31], enlarge the words to that wider acceptance, in which he rejoices, Phil. i. 18. As regarded himself, the word of God might be said to be bound, inasmuch as he was prevented from the free proclamation of it: his person was not free, though his tongue and pen were. This more general reference Chrysostom himself seems elsewhere to admit, for he says, "The teacher was bound, and the word flew abroad; he inhabited his prison, and the doctrine ran with wings all over the world."—The purpose of adding this seems to be, to remind Timothy that his sufferings and imprisonment had in no way weakened the power of the Gospel, or loosened the ties by which he [Timothy] was bound to the service of it).

10.] For this reason (what reason? "Because while I am bound the Gospel runneth," says Bengel, and with this others agree. But neither 1) is this sound logic, nor 2) is it in accordance with the Apostle's usage of the expression "for this cause that."

1) The fact, that the word of God is not bound, is clearly not the reason why he suffers these things for the elect: nor can we say with Huther, that the consciousness of this fact is that in which he endures all. De Wette takes the predominant idea to be, the dispersion and success of God's word, in and by which the Apostle is encouraged to suffer. But this would render the connexion very loose. 2) In 1 Tim. i. 16, and Philem. 15, the reference of "for this cause" is evidently to what follows: compare also Rom. iv. 16, 2 Cor. xiii. 10. I would therefore refer the words to the following, and consider them, as in the above instances, as a marked way of indicating the reason presently to be given: 'for this purpose, . . . that;' so Chrysostom and others) I endure all things (not merely suffer [objective]: but readiness and persistence [subjective] are implied in the word, and the universal all things belongs to this subjective meaning—"I am enduring, ready to bear, all things") for the sake of the elect (see especially Tit. i. 1. The Apostle does not refer merely to those elect of God who are not yet converted, but generally to the whole category, both those who are already turned to him, and those who are yet to be turned: compare the parallel declaration in Col. i. 24), that they also (as well as ourselves with reference to what is to follow, the certainty that we, who suffer with Him, shall reign with Him) may obtain the salvation which is in (as its element and condition of existence) Christ Jesus with eternal glory (salvation here, in its spiritual presence and power—"by grace ye have been saved," Eph. ii. 5: and glory hereafter, the full development and expansion of salvation, Rom. viii. 21). Faithful is the saying (another of those current Christian sayings, probably the utterances originally of the Spirit by those who spoke prophecies in the Church—and, as in 1 Tim. iii. 16, bearing with it so much of balance and rhythmical arrangement, as to seem to be a portion of some hymn): For (Chrysostom and others regard this for as rendering a reason why the saying is faithful, understanding faithful is the saying of what has gone before, viz. the certainty that he who obtains salvation shall also win eternal glory. But this is most unnatural. The for is not merely explicative, but as in 1 Tim. iv. 9, renders a reason for the assertion that the saying is faithful,—in the declaration of the fact in well-known words: for the fact is so, that if &c.) if we died with Him (pointing to some one definite event: the reference must be to that participation in Christ's death which takes place at baptism in all those who are His, and which those who follow Him in sufferings emphatically shew that they then did really take on them: see Rom. vi. 3, 4, 8: Col. ii. 12. Certainly if the past tense stood alone, it might be taken as anticipatory, looking back on life from that future day in which the living with him will be realized: but coupled as it is with the present, "we endure," and the future, "we shall deny," we can hardly take it otherwise than literally as to time, of an event already past, and if so, strictly as in the parallel Rom. vi. 8, where the reference is clear), we shall also live with Him (hereafter in glory): if we endure (with Him: see Rom. viii. 17), we shall also reign with Him (see Rom. v. 17; viii. 17. See Rom. iii. 3).

14—26.] Application of the above general exhortations to the teaching and conversation of Timothy, especially with reference to the false teachers. 14.]

These things (those which have just preceded, vv. 8—13) call to their minds (the minds, viz. of those among whom thou art ministering, as the context shews: see a similar ellipsis in Tit. iii. 8), adjuring them before the Lord not to contend about words (see 1 Tim. vi. 4), (a thing) useful for no purpose, (but practised) to the ruin (the opposite of edification, or building up: see 2 Cor. xiii. 10) of them that hear.

15.] The connexion is close:—by averting them from vain and unprofitable things, approve thine own work, so that it may stand in the day of the Lord.—Strive to present thyself (emphatic, as distinguished from those alluded to in the preceding verse) to God approved (tested by trial, and found to have stood the test), a workman (a general word, of any kind of labourer, used of teachers perhaps from the parable in Matt. xx.) unshamed (by his work being found unworthy: see Phil. i. 20, and 1 Cor. iv. 4. "One into whom thine own conscience strikes no shame," Bengel), rightly laying out (the meaning of the word thus rendered has been much discussed. But it seems agreed that to cut straight [as a road, &c.] is its literal force; and hence 'laying out aright' is the figurative sense) the word of the truth.

16.] But (contrast not merely to the laying out rightly, but to the whole course of conduct recommended in the last verse) profane babblings (see ref. 1 Tim.) avoid (the meaning seems to come from a number of persons falling back from an object of fear or loathing, and standing at a distance round it. The word thus rendered is peculiar, its primary sense being "stand round"): for they (the false teachers) will advance to a worse pitch of ungodliness. And their word will eat (lit. "will find pasture," as in John x. 9: and the word representing pasture is the medical term for the consuming progress of mortifying disease) as a gangrene (or cancer): of whom is Hymenæus (see note

1 Tim. i. 20) and Philetus (of him nothing further is known); men who concerning the truth went astray (compare 1 Tim. vi. 21), saying that the resurrection has already taken place (Tertullian tells us, that they did this by spiritualizing both death and the resurrection, making the one mean the state of sinful nature, the other that of grace. This error, which belonged to the Gnostics subsequently, may well have been already sown and springing up in the apostolic age. If the form of it was that described by Tertullian, it would be one of those instances of wresting the words of St. Paul himself [compare Col. ii. 12: Rom. vi. 4], of which St. Peter speaks 2 Pet. iii. 16); and are overturning the faith of some.

19.] Firm endurance, notwithstanding this overturning of the faith of some, of the church of God: its signs and seals.—Nevertheless God's firm foundation standeth (not, as A. V. ungrammatically, 'the foundation of God standeth sure.' But what is God's firm foundation? Very various interpretations have been given. Some explain it the fundamental doctrine of the Resurrection: others, the promises of God: others, the immovable faith of God: others, Christ, 1 Cor. iii. 11: some, the Christian religion: others, again, God's election. Right is it the congregation of the faithful, considered as a foundation of a building placed by God,—the house spoken of in the next verse. Against the tottering faith of those just mentioned, he sets the firm foundation which stands. It cannot be moved: Heb. xii. 28), having ('seeing it hath,' with a very faint causal force, illustrating the previous declaration) this seal (probably in allusion to the practice of engraving inscriptions over doors [Deut. vi. 9; xi. 20] and on pillars and foundation stones [Rev. xxi. 14]. The seal [inscription] would indicate ownership and destination: both of which are pointed at in the two texts following) (1) The Lord knoweth (see 1 Cor. viii. 3, note) them that are His: and (2), Let every one that nameth the name of the Lord (viz. as his Lord: not exactly equivalent to 'callethe on the name of the Lord') stand aloof from iniquity (the passage in Isa. stands, "Depart ye, depart ye, go ye out from thence, touch not the unclean thing; go out of the midst of her: be ye clean that bear the vessels of the Lord." It is clearly no reason against this passage being here alluded to, that it is expressly cited 2 Cor. vi. 17. Ellicott remarks, that it is possibly in continued allusion to Num. xvi. 26, "Separate yourselves from the tents of these wicked men").

20.] Those who are truly the Lord's are known to Him and depart from iniquity: but in the visible church there are many unworthy members. This is illustrated by the following similitude.—But (contrast to the preceding definition of the Lord's people) in a great house (Chrysostom and others understand by this great house, the world: but it is far better understood of the church, for the reason given by Calvin: "that the context here teaches us to understand it of the church: for Paul is not treating of those without, but of God's own family." The idea then is much the same as that in the parable of the drag-net, Matt. xiii. 47—49: not in the parable of the tares of the field: for there it is expressly said, "The field is the world") there are not only vessels of gold and silver, but also of wood and earthenware; and some for honour, some for dishonour (viz. in the use of the vessels themselves: not, as some explain it, to bring honour or dishonour on the house or its inhabitants. Estius, anxious to avoid the idea of heretics being in the church, would understand the two classes in each sentence as those distinguished by gifts, and those not so distinguished: but this seems alien from the context: compare especially the next verse).

21.] Here the thing signified is mingled with the similitude: the voluntary act described belonging, not to the vessels, but to the members of the church who are designated by them. If then (then deduces a consequence from the similitude: this similitude being taken for granted) any man (member of the church) shall purify himself from among (shall in the process of purifying himself depart from among) these (viz. the latter mentioned vessels in each parallel; but more especially the vessels to dishonour, from what follows), he shall be a vessel for honour, sanctified (this word rendered sanctified is a favourite word with our Apostle to describe the saints of God), useful for the master (of the house), prepared for every good work.

22.] Exhortations, taken up again from ver. 16, on the matter of the intervening verses have been a digression.—But (contrast to the last-mentioned character, ver. 21) youthful lusts fly from: but (so literally: contrast to the hypothesis of the opposite course to that recommended above) follow after righteousness (moral rectitude, as contrasted with iniquity, ver. 19: not, 'the righteousness which is by faith;'

far better Calvin: 'that is, right living. See the parallel, 1 Tim. vi. 11), faith, love, peace with (this with belongs to "peace," not to "follow after." We are to cultivate being at peace with men that call on the Lord out of a pure heart) those who call upon the Lord (Christ, see 1 Cor. i. 2) out of a pure heart (these last words serve to designate the earnest and single-minded, as contrasted with the false teachers, who called on Him, but not out of a pure heart: compare ch. iii. 5, 8, and especially Tit. i. 15, 16).

23.] But (contrast again to the hypothesis of the contrary of the last exhortation) foolish (Titus iii. 9) and undisciplined (unrestrained by proper rules, out of the course of Christian discipline, and so, irregular) questionings decline, being aware that they gender strifes. The meaning being much the same, the definite article in rendering gives the emphasis, and points out the individual servant, better than the indefinite) servant of the Lord (Jesus; see 1 Cor. vii. 22. It is evident from what follows, that the servant of the Lord here, in the Apostle's view, is not so much every true Christian,—however applicable such a maxim may be to him also,—but the minister of Christ, as Timothy was: compare "apt to teach, &c." below) must not strive (this maxim takes for granted, that the servant must be like his Lord, and argues from that); but be gentle towards all, apt to teach (so A. CH. III. 1—9.] Warning of bad times to come, in which men shall be ungodly and hypocritical:—nay, against such men as already present, and doing mischief.

1.] But (the contrast is in the dark prophetic announcement, so different in character from the hope just expressed) know this, that in the last days (see 1 Tim. iv. 1, where the expression is somewhat different. The period referred to here is, from all New Test. analogy [compare 2 Pet. iii. 3; Jude 18], that immediately preceding the coming of the Lord. That day and hour being hidden from all men, and even from the Son Himself, Mark xiii. 32,—the Spirit of prophecy, which is the Spirit of the Son, did not reveal to the Apostles its place in the ages of time. They, like the subsequent generations of the Church, were kept waiting for it, and for the most part wrote and spoke of it as soon to appear; not however without many and sufficient hints furnished by the Spirit, of an interval, and that no short one, first to elapse. In this place, these last days are set before Timothy as being on their way, and indeed their premonitory symptoms already appearing. The discovery which the lapse of centuries and the ways of Providence have made to us,—"my Lord delayeth His coming,"—misleads none but unfaithful servants: while the only modification in the understanding of the premonitory symptoms, is, that for us, He with whom a thousand years are as one day has spread them, without changing their substance or their truth, over many consecutive ages. See 1 John ii. 18,—where we have the still plainer assertion, "It is the last time") grievous times shall come (literally, "shall be instant").

'blasphemous,' though the Greek word is 'blasphemoi;' it has not the reference to things sacred unless the context neces- sarily leads to that meaning just at this point: the sins mentioned are more against men than against God, disobedient to parents ("the character of the times is much to be gathered from the manners of youth," says Bengel), ungrateful, unholy, without natural affection, implacable (it does not appear that the word ever means 'truce-breakers,' but rather, 'that will make' or 'admit no truce': i. e. implacable), slanderers, incontinent, inhuman (or, fierce), no lovers of good (so literally), traitors, headlong (either in action, or in passion [temper], which would in fact amount to the same), besotted by pride (see note, 1 Tim. iii. 6), lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God; having a (or, the) form (outward embodiment: the same meaning as in Rom. ii. 26, but here confined, by the contrast following, to the mere outward semblance; whereas there, no contrast occurring, the outward embodiment is the real representation) of godliness, but having denied (not present, 'denying,' as A. V.,—'renouncing,' as Conybeare; their condemnation is, that they are living in the semblance of God's fear, but have repudiated its reality) the power of it (its living and renewing influence over the heart and life).—Compare throughout this description, Rom. i. 30, 31. Huther remarks, "We can hardly trace any formal rule of arrangement through these predicates. Here and there, it is true, a few cognate ideas are grouped together: the two first are connected by the prefix, 'lovers of;' then follow three words betokening high-mindedness: 'disobedient to parents' is followed by 'unthankful;' this word opens a long series of negative epithets, but interrupted by 'slanderers;' the following seem some of them to be connected in the original by likeness of sound: others by connexion of meaning, as 'headlong,' and 'besotted with pride.' But this very interpenetration serves to depict more vividly the whole manifoldness of the manifestation of evil"): from these also (as well as from those things and persons of whom he was before warned, eb. ii. 16, 21, 23) turn away (compare 1 Tim. vi. 20. This command shews that the Apostle treats the symptoms of the last times as not future exclusively, but in some respects present: see note above, ver. 1).

6.] For (reason of the foregoing command, seeing that they are already among you) among the number of these are they who creep ("see how he points at the shamelessness of their conduct by this word,—their dishonourableness, their craft, their trickery." Chrysostom) into [men's] houses, and take captive (as it were prisoners; a word admirably describing the influence acquired by sneaking proselytizers over those presently described: attach to themselves entirely, so that they follow them as if dragged about by them) silly women (in the Greek, a diminutive of the word signifying women, denoting contempt) laden with sins (De Wette alone seems to have given the true reason of the insertion of this particular. The stress is on laden: they are burdened, their con-sciences oppressed, with sins, and in this morbid state they lie open to the insidious attacks of these proselytizers who promise them ease of conscience if they will follow them), led about by lusts of all kinds (I should rather imagine, from the context, that the reference here is not so much to 'fleshly lusts' properly so called, —though from what we know of such feminine spiritual attachments, ancient [see below] and modern, such must by no means be excluded, —as to the ever-shifting passion for change in doctrine and manner of teaching, which is the eminent characteristic of these captives to designing spiritual teachers,—the running after popular and fashionable men and popular and fashionable tenets, which draw them in flocks in the most opposite and inconsistent directions. Who has not seen this exemplified in the growth of Irvingism, Methodism, Evangelicalism, High-Churchism, and all the other -isms?), evermore learning (always with some new point absorbing them, which seems to them the most important, to the depreciation of what they held and seemed to know before), and never yet (with all their learning) able to come to the thorough knowledge (the decisive and stable apprehension, in which they might be grounded and settled against further novelties) of the truth (this again is referred by Chrysostom and others, to moral deadening of their apprehension by profligate lives. It may be so, in the deeper ground of the psychological reason for this their fickle and imperfect condition: but I should rather think that the Apostle here indicates their character as connected with the fact of their captivity to these teachers.—With regard to the fact itself, we have abundant testimony that the Gnostic heresy in its progress, as indeed all new and strange systems, laid hold chiefly of the female sex: see the instances quoted in my Greek Test. De Wette remarks, "This is an admirable characterization of zealous soul-hunters (who have been principally found, and are still found, among the Roman Catholics) and their victims. We must not however divide the different traits among different classes or individuals: it is their combination only which is characteristic." "One would say," says Calvin, "that Paul was here designedly painting the portraiture of the life of the cloister"). 8.] But (i. e., it is no wonder that there should be now such opponents to the truth, for their prototypes existed also in ancient times) as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses (these are believed to be traditional names of the Egyptian magicians mentioned in Exod. vii. 11, 22. Origen says, "That which we read in St. Paul, 'Jannes and Mambres withstood Moses,' is not found in the public Scriptures, but in a secret book inscribed 'Jannes and Mambres,' but Theodoret's account is more probable, that St. Paul learnt their names, not out of the Holy Scriptures, but from the unwritten teaching of the Jews," especially as the names are found in the Targum of Jonathan on Exod. vii. 11; xxii. 22. The traditional history of Jannes and Jambres, collected out of the rabbinical books, is as follows: They were the sons of Balaam—prophesied to Pharaoh the birth of Moses, in consequence of which he gave the order for the destruction of the Jewish children, —and thenceforward appear as the counsellors of much of the evil,—in Egypt, and in the desert, after the Exodus,—which happened to Israel. They were variously reported to have perished in the Red Sea, or to have been killed in the tumult consequent on the making the golden calf, which they had advised), thus these also withstand the truth: being men corrupted in mind, worthless (not abiding the test, reprobate) concerning the faith (in respect of the faith). 9.] Notwithstanding, they shall not advance further (in ch. ii. 16, it is said, "they shall advance further in ungodliness:" and it is in vain to deny that there is an apparent and literal inconsistency between the two assertions. But on looking further into them, it is manifest, that while there the Apostle is speaking of an immediate spread of error, here he is looking to its ultimate defeat and extinction: for their folly (unintelligent and senseless method of proselytizing and upholding their opinions—and indeed folly of those opinions themselves) shall be thoroughly manifested to all, as also that of those men was (Exod. viii. 18: ix. 11: but most probably the allusion is to their traditional end).

10—17.] Contrast, by way of reminding and exhortation, of the education, knowledge, and life of Timothy, with the character just drawn of the opponents.—But thou followedst ('followedst as thy pattern: 'it was my example in all these things which was set before thee as thy guide—thou wert a follower of me, as I of Christ.' The indefinite past tense is both less obvious and more appropriate than the perfect: this was the example set before him, and the reminiscence joined to the exhortation of ver. 14, bears something of reproach with it, which is quite in accordance with what we have reason to infer from the general tone of the Epistle. Whereas the perfect, as in A. V., would imply that the example had been really ever before him, and followed up to the present moment: and so would weaken the necessity of the exhortation) my teaching, conduct, purpose (Ellicott remarks, that in all other passages in St. Paul's Epistles, this word purpose is used with reference to God), faith, longsuffering ("his bearing with the offences of the brethren," Theodoret: or perhaps, as Chrysostom,—"his patience in respect of the false teachers and the troubles of the time"), love ("which they had not," Chrysostom), endurance

(or patience: "how generously I bear the attacks of my enemies," Theodoret), persecutions ("to these endurance furnished the note of transition," Huther), sufferings (not only was I persecuted, but the persecution issued in infliction of suffering), such (sufferings) as befell me in Antioch (of Pisidia), in Iconium, in Lystra (why should these be especially enumerated? Theodoret assigns as a reason, "Omitting mention of other dangers, he speaks only of those which happened to him in Pisidia and Lycaonia. For he to whom he was writing was a Lycaonian, and these incidents were better known to him than the rest." And so Chrysostom, and many both ancient and modern. It may be so, doubtless: and this reason, though rejected by De Wette and others, seems much better to suit the context and probability, than the other, given by Huther, that these persecutions were the first which befell the Apostle in his missionary work among the heathen. It is objected to it, that during the former of these persecutions Timothy was not with St. Paul. But the answer to that is easy. At the time of his conversion, they were recent, and the talk of the churches in those parts: and thus, especially with our rendering, and the indefinite past sense of "thou followedst," would be naturally mentioned, as being those sufferings of the Apostle which first excited the young convert's attention to make them his own pattern of what he too must suffer for the Gospel's sake. Baur and De Wette regard the exact correspondence with the Acts [xiii. 50; xiv. 5, 19; xvi. 3] as a suspicious circumstance. Wiesinger well asks, would they have regarded a discrepancy from the Acts as a mark of genuineness?); what persecutions (or, such persecutions as:—understand, 'thou sawest; in proposing to thyself a pattern thou hadst before thee . . .') I underwent: and out of all the Lord

But (on the other hand: a reason why persecutions must be expected, and even worse and more bitter as time goes on. The opposition certainly, as seems to me, is to the clause immediately preceding, not to ver. 10 f. There would thus be no real contrast: whereas on our view, it is forcibly represented that the breach between light and darkness, between godliness and wickedness, would not be healed, but rather widened, as time went on) evil men (in general,—over the world: particularized, as applying to the matter in hand, by the next words) and impostors (literally, magicians, in allusion probably to the Egyptian magicians mentioned above) shall grow worse and worse ('advance in the direction of worse': see above, ver. 9. There the diffusion of evil was spoken of: here, its intensity), deceiving and being deceived. 14.] But do thou continue in the things which thou learnedst (see ch. ii. 2) and wert convinced of, knowing (as thou dost) from what teachers (viz. thy mother Lois and grandmother Eunice, ch. i. 5: compare "from a child," below: not Paul and Barnabas, as Grotius, nor the many witnesses of ch. ii. 2. If the singular [as in A. V.] be read, then the Apostle must be meant) thou learnedst them; and (knowing) that from a child (more than this: from an infant is the literal reading) thou knowest the holy scriptures (of the Old Test. This expression [the sacred writings] for the Scriptures, not elsewhere found in the New Test., is common in Josephus), which are able to make thee wise unto (towards the attainment of) salvation by means of (the instrument whereby the making wise is to take place: not to be joined to "salvation," as some do) faith, namely, that which is in (which rests upon, is reposed in) Christ Jesus. 16.] The immense value to Timothy of this early instruction is shewn by a declaration of the profit of Scripture in furthering the spiritual life. There is considerable doubt about the construction of the first clause in this verse, the grounds of which it is hardly possible to bring before an English reader. Is it to be taken, (1) every scripture (subject) (is) inspired by God (predicate), and profitable: or (2) every scripture inspired by God (subject) is also profitable (predicate)? The former is followed by Chrysostom, Gregory of Nyssa, Athanasius, Estius, Calvin, &c., and by the A. V. The latter by Origen, Theodoret, by Grotius, Erasmus, &c., and the ancient Syriac version, the Latin Vulgate, and Luther. In deciding between these two, the following considerations must be weighed by the English reader, exclusive of those which require a knowledge of the arrangement and requirement of the Greek: (a) the requirement of the context. IV. <sup>1</sup> I charge thee there- the present verse plainly is to set before Timothy the value of his early instruction, as a motive to his remaining faithful to it. It is then very possible, that the Apostle might wish to exalt the dignity of the Scripture by asserting of it that it was inspired by God, and then out of this lofty predicate might unfold that it was also profitable, &c.;—its various uses in the spiritual life. On the other hand it may be urged, that thus the two epithets do not hang naturally together, the first consisting of the one word God-inspired, and the other being expanded into a whole sentence: especially as in order at all to give symmetry to the whole, the end stated in ver. 17 must be understood as the purposed result of the inspiration as well as of the profit of the Scriptures, which is hardly natural: (b) the requirements of the grammatical construction: see in my Greek Test.—I own on the whole the balance seems to me to incline on the side of (2), unobjectionable as it is in construction, and of the two, better suited to the context. I therefore follow it, hesitatingly, I confess, but feeling that it is not to be lightly overthrown. Every Scripture (not 'every writing': the word never occurs in the New Test. except in the sense of 'Scripture.' It may mean, perhaps, all Scripture: but, in the presence of such an expression as "another Scripture saith," John xix. 37, it is safer to keep to the meaning, unobjectionable both grammatically and contextually, 'every Scripture'—i. e. 'every part of Scripture') given by inspiration of God (this word inspired, like that in the Greek, is an expression and idea connected with breath, the power of the divine Spirit being conceived of as a breath of life: the word thus amounts to 'breathed through,' 'full of the Spirit.' It (the idea) is common to Jews, Greeks, and Romans. Josephus speaks of the prophets as having learnt according to the afflatus (breathing into them) from God. Plato and Plutarch speak of inspired wisdom and inspired dreams; Cicero says, "No one ever was a great man without some divine afflatus." "Inspired" is first found as a predicate of persons: compare Matt. xxii. 43; 2 Pet. i. 21: then it was also applied to things. On the meaning of the word as applied to the Scriptures, see Introd. to Vol. I. 'On the inspiration of the Gospels.' As applied to the prophets, the sense would not materially differ, except that we ever regard one speaking prophecy, strictly so called, as more immediately and thoroughly the mouthpiece of the Holy Spirit, seeing that the future is wholly hidden from men, and God does not in this case use or inspire human testimony to facts, but suggests the whole substance of what is said, direct from Himself) is also (besides this its quality of inspiration: on the construction, see above) profitable for (towards) teaching (this, the teaching of the person reading the Scriptures, not the making him a teacher, is evidently the meaning. It is not Timothy's ability as a teacher, but his stability as a Christian, which is here in question), for conviction ("for it convicts our sinful life," Theodoret. The above remark applies here also), for correction ("for it exhorts wanderers to return into the right way," Theodoret), for discipline (see Eph. vi. 4, and note) which is in righteousness (which is versed in, as its element and condition, righteousness, and so disciplines a man to be holy, just, and true): that (result of the profitableness of Scripture: reasons why God has, having Himself inspired it, endowed it with this profitableness) the man of God (1 Tim. vi. 11 and note) may be complete (perfect at every point), thoroughly made ready to every good work (rather to be generally understood than officially: the man of God is not only a teacher, but any spiritual man: and the whole of the present passage regards the universal spiritual life. In ch. iv. 1 ff. he returns to the official duties of Timothy: but here he is on that which is the common basis of all duty).

—I adjure thee (literally, I earnestly call thee to witness) before God, and Christ Jesus, who is about to (or if this seems to imply too near a coming to judgment, who shall one day) judge living and dead, and by (i.e. ‘and I call thee to witness,’ as in Dent. iv. 26, the construction being changed from that in the first clause) his appearing and his kingdom (each has its place in the adjuration:—His coming, at which we shall stand before him;—His kingdom, in which we hope to reign with Him); 2.] proclaim the word (of God); be urgent (this is generally referred to the last clause—‘be diligent in preaching:’ but the commandment most probably refers, not to preaching only, but in the whole work of the ministry) in season, out of season (“have no defined season, let all time be thy season; not only in peace; not only in security; nor yet when sitting in the church only; even if thou be in perils, even if in prison, even if bound with a chain, even if being led out to die, at every such opportunity, convict, and shrink not from rebuking: for then it is that rebuke is in season, when the conviction goes forward, and the fact is demonstrated.” Chrysostom. I cannot forbear also transcribing a very beautiful passage from the same Father: “But if men continue in the same courses even after our exhortation, not even then must we abstain from counselling them. For fountains flow, even if no one draw from them: and rivers run, though no one drinks. So too the preacher ought, even if no one attend to him, to fulfil all his own duty; for our rule, who have taken in hand the ministry of the word, is laid down by God the lover of men, that his part is never to slacken, nor to be silent, whether men hear, or pass by.” This latter passage gives the more correct reference,—not so much to his opportunities, as the former, but to theirs); convict, rebuke, exhort; in (not ‘with;’ it is not the accompaniment of the actions, but the element, the temper in which they are to be performed) all (possible) longsuffering and doctrine (not subjective ‘perseverance in teaching,’ as Conybeare; but ‘doctrine’ itself: it [objective] is to be the element in which these acts take place, as well as longsuffering [subjective]. The junction is harsh, but not therefore to be avoided).

3, 4.] Reason why all these will be wanted.—For there shall be a time when they (men, i.e. professing Christians, as the context shews) will not endure (not bear—as being offensive to them) the healthy doctrine (viz. of the Gospel); but according to (after the course of) their own desires (instead of, in subjection to God’s providence) will to themselves (emphatic) heap up (one upon another) teachers, having itching ears (i.e. seeking to hear for their own pleasure; wanting their vices and infirmities to be tickled); and shall avert their ears from the truth, and be turned aside to fables. 5 ff.] He enforces on Timothy the duty of worthily fulfilling his office, in consideration of his own approaching end. For this being introduced, various reasons have been given:—(1) he himself would be no longer able to make head against these adverse influences, and thou in all things, endure afflictions, do the work of an evangelist, make full proof of thy ministry. <sup>6</sup> For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. <sup>7</sup> I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: <sup>8</sup> henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but therefore must leave Timothy and others to replace him: (2) Timothy had had his assistance hitherto: but it is now time that he became his own master, and not be changed for the worse by losing St. Paul: so Calvin and Grotius: (3) the death and blessedness of St. Paul is set before him as a motive to incite him to his duty: so Bengel; and Chrysostom, in a very beautiful passage, too long for transcription: (4) to stir up Timothy to imitation of him. There seems no reason why any one of these should be chosen to the exclusion of the rest: we may well combine (1) and (4), at the same time bearing (2) and (3) in mind:—"I am no longer here to withstand these things: be thou a worthy successor of me, no longer depending on, but carrying out for thyself my directions: follow my steps, inherit their result, and the honour of their end."

5.] But (as contrasted with the description preceding) do thou (emphatic) be sober (or, watch: it is difficult to give the full meaning of the word in a version. The reference is especially to the clearness and wakefulness of attention and observance which attends on sobriety, as distinguished from the lack of these qualities in intoxication. 'Keep thy coolness and presence of mind, that thou be not entrapped into forgetfulness, but discern and use every opportunity of speaking and acting for the truth') in all things, suffer hardship, do the work of an Evangelist (here probably in a wide sense, including all that belongs to a preacher and teacher of the Gospel), fill up the measure of (fill up, in every point; leave nothing undone in) thy ministry. 6.] For the connexion, see above. For I am already being poured out (as a drink-offering: i. e. the process is begun, which shall shed my blood. 'Ready to be offered' [as A. V., &c.] misses the force of the present tense), and the time of my departure is at hand. 7.] I have striven the good strife (it is hardly correct to confine the verb or the substantive to the sense of 'fight': that it may be, but its reference is much wider, to any contest: and here probably to that which is specified in the next clause: see especially Heb. xii. 1), I have finished my race (see references: the image belongs peculiarly to St. Paul. In Phil. iii. 12 ff. he follows it out in detail. See also 1 Cor. ix. 24 ff.; Heb. xii. 1, 2), I have kept the faith: 8.] henceforth there is laid up for me the (not, 'a,' as A. V.) crown (compare Phil. iii. 14) of righteousness (i. e. the bestowal of which is conditional on the substantiation and recognition of righteousness. There is, as Calvin has shewn, no sort of inconsistency here with the doctrines of grace: "for the gratuitous justification which is conferred on us by grace does not militate against the reward of good works, nay, rather the two exactly agree, that man is justified gratis by Christ's merit, and yet shall receive the reward of his works before God. For as soon as God receives us into grace, He is pleased with our works, so that He accounts them worthy of reward though undeserved"), which the Lord (Christ: compare the words "His appearing" below) shall award (more than 'give': see Matt. vi. 4, 6, &c., xvi. 27: the idea of requital should be expressed) me in that day, the righteous ('just': but the word 'righteous' should be kept as answering to 'righteousness' above) judge (see Acts x. 42. In this assertion of just judgment, there is nothing to controvert the doctrines of grace: see above);—and (but) not only to me (better than ‘not to me only,’ A. V., which though true, does not correctly represent the sense), but also to all who have loved (who shall then be found to have loved and still to be loving: loved, i. e. looked forward with earnest joy to) His appearing (ver. 1).

9—22.] Request to come to Rome. Notices of his own state and that of others: greetings.

9 ff.] Do thine endeavour (so also Tit. iii. 12) to come to me quickly (this desire that Timothy should come to him, appears in ch. i. 4, 8: its reason is now specified): for (I am almost alone) Demas (mentioned Col. iv. 14 with Luke, as saluting the Colossians, and Philem. 24, also with Luke [and others], as one of the Apostle’s fellow-workmen) deserted me, loving (i. e. ‘through love of’) this present world (“fond of ease, safety, and security, he chose rather to luxuriate at home, than to suffer hardship with me, and help me to bear my present perils.” Chrysostom), and went to Thessalonica (‘his birthplace,’ says De Wette: so it would seem thought Chrysostom, above; but how ascertained? He may have gone there for the sake of traffic, which idea the mention of his love of this world would seem to support); Crescens (not named elsewhere. He is said traditionally to have preached the Gospel in Galatia, and more recently, to have founded the church at Vienne in Gaul: this latter interpretation of Galatia Theodoret also adopts. All this traditional fabric is probably raised by conjecture on this passage) to Galatia (see Introd. to Gal. § ii. 1), Titus (Introd. to Titus, § i.) to Dalmatia (part of the Roman province of Illyricum, on the coast of the Adriatic, south of Liburnia.—Theodoret says, referring to the words “loving this present world,” “These last [Crescens and Titus] are free from this charge; for they were sent by him to preach.” But this hardly agrees with the necessity of supplying “departed” from the former sentence, which verb must be understood with both names: see also the contrast in ver. 12. They had certainly left the Apostle of their own accord: why, does not appear). Luke (see Introd. to Luke’s Gospel, § i.) is alone with me (De Wette’s question, ‘where then was Aristarchus [Acts xxvii. 2. Col. iv. 10. Philem. 24]?’ is one which we have no means of answering: but we may venture this remark: a forger, such as De Wette supposes the writer of this Epistle to be, would have taken good care to account for him). Mark (Col. iv. 10, note: Philem. 24. John Mark, Acts xv. 38) take up (on thy way), and bring with thee: for he is to me useful for the ministry (for help to me in my apostolic labours). But (apparently a slight contrast is intended to those above, who departed of their own accord) Tychicus (see Eph. vi. 21 note) I sent to Ephesus (on the various attempts to give an account of this journey, and its bearing on the question, whether Timothy was at Ephesus at this time, see Introd. to this Epistle, § i. 5).

13.] The cloak (some, as early as Chrysostom, who mentions the view, thought this word signified a bag, in which the books were: so the Syriac Version renders it: but it is against this idea, as indeed Bengel remarks, that the books should be afterwards mentioned. It would be unnatural, in case a bag of books had been left behind, to ask a friend to bring

"What did he want with books," says Chrysostom, "when he was about to depart to God? He wanted them much, to give them to the faithful, that they might possess them instead of his teaching." This may have been so: but there is nothing inconsistent with his near prospect of death, in a desire to have his cloak and books during the approaching winter), especially the parchments (which as more costly, probably contained the more valuable writings: perhaps the sacred books themselves. On a possible allusion to these books, &c., which the Apostle had with him in his imprisonment at Cæsarea, see note, Acts xxvi. 24).

<sup>14.</sup> Alexander the smith (not of necessity copper-smith. Perhaps the same with the Alexander of 1 Tim. i. 20, where see note. There is nothing here said inconsistent with his being an Ephesian resident. It has been indeed supposed that he was at Rome, and that the following caution refers to Timothy's approaching visit: but the past tense here used seems to suit better the other hypothesis. It must ever remain uncertain, whether the Alexander whom we find put forward by the Jews in the Ephesian tumult, Acts xix. 33, 34, is this same person: nothing in that narrative is against it. The title "the smith" may be intended to mark another Alexander: but it may also be a mere cursory designation of the same person) did to me much evil: the Lord shall requite him according to his works (the wish expressed in the received text would make no real difficulty: it is not personal revenge, but zeal for the cause of the Gospel which the wish would express: compare ver. 16 below, where his own personal feelings were concerned): whom do thou also beware of (see above, on Alexander); for he exceedingly withstood our (better than 'my,' seeing that "me" occurs in the same sentence, and immediately follows. of and by our Apostle) me; that by my means the proclamation (of the Gospel) might be delivered in full measure (see on ver. 5), and all the Gentiles might hear (one is tempted, with Theodoret, to interpret this of his preservation for further missionary journeys [Theodoret thinks this defence happened during his journey to Spain]: but the spirit of the whole context seems to forbid this, and to compel us to confine this delivering in full measure to the effect of the single occasion referred to,—his acquittal before the crowd of people, in whose presence the trials took place: so Bengel—"one occasion is often of the greatest moment: the Gentiles—of whom Rome was the capital"); and I was delivered from the mouth of the lion (the Fathers mostly understood this of Nero. And Esth. [apocryphal] xiv. 13, A. V., is quoted, "where Esther says concerning Artaxerxes, Put a word into my mouth before the lion." Whitby:—or, seeing that according to the chronology adopted by some, Nero was not in Rome at the time [see Introd. to Pastoral Epistles, § ii. 33], of his locum tenens, Ælius Casareanus,—or of the Jewish accuser. But these are hardly probable: nor again is it, that the Apostle was literally in danger of being thrown to wild beasts, and established his right as a Roman citizen to be exempted from that punishment: nor again is the idea, that the expression is figurative for great danger,—the jaws of death, or the like: for the Apostle did not fear death, but looked forward to it as the end of his course, and certainly would not have spoken of it under this image. The context seems to me to demand another and very different interpretation. None stood with him—all forsook him: but the Lord stood by him and strengthened him: for what? that he might witness a good confession, and that the preaching might be expanded to the utmost. The result of this strengthening was, that he was delivered from the mouth of the lion: he was strengthened, witnessed a good confession, in spite of desertion and discouragement. Then let us pass on to his confidence for the future, the expression of which is bound on to this sentence by the same verb, shall deliver me, indicating the identity of God's deliverance,—and "from every evil work," indicating the generalization of the danger of which this was a particular case. And how is the danger generally described? as "every evil work:" and it is implied that the falling into such danger would preclude him from enduring to Christ's heavenly kingdom. It was then an evil work from which he was on this occasion delivered. What evil work? The falling into the power of the tempter; the giving way, in his own weakness and the desertion of all, and betraying the Gospel for which he was sent as a witness. The lion then is the devil; "who goeth about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour," 1 Pet. v. 8).

18.] The Lord (Jesus) shall deliver me from every evil work (see above: from every danger of faint-heartedness, and apostasy. The meaning adopted by some, that the evil works are the works of his adversaries plotting against him, is totally beside the purpose: he had no such confidence (ver. 6), nor would his conservation to Christ's heavenly kingdom depend in the least upon such deliverance. Besides which, the correspondence of this declaration of confidence to the concluding petition of the Lord's Prayer cannot surely be fortuitous, and then evil, here joined to work as neuter, must be subjective, evil resulting from our falling into temptation, not evil happening to us from without), and shall preserve me safe (shall save me: but in its not uncommon, pregnant sense of 'bring safe') unto his kingdom in heaven (though it may be conceded to De Wette that this expression is not otherwise found in St. Paul, it is one to which his existing expressions easily lead on: e. g.

Amen (it is again objected, that in St. Paul we never find doxologies ascribing glory to Christ, but always to God. This however is not strictly true: compare Rom. ix. 5. And even if it were, the whole train of thought here leading naturally on to the ascription of such doxology, why should it not occur for the first and only time? It would seem to be an axiom with some critics, that a writer can never use an expression once only. If the expression be entirely out of keeping with his usual thoughts and diction, this may be a sound inference: but this is certainly not the case in the present instance. Besides, the petition of the Lord's Prayer having been transferred to our Lord as its fulfiller [compare John xiv. 13, 14], the doxology, which seems to have come into liturgical use almost as soon as the prayer itself, would naturally suggest a corresponding doxology here).

CHAP. I. 1—4.] ADDRESS AND GREETING.

1.] The occurrence of the servant of God, not elsewhere found in the superscriptions of St. Paul's Epistles, is a mark of genuineness: a forger would have been sure to suit every expression of this kind to the well-known habits of the Apostle.

and (literally, but): it further defines—a servant of God,—this is general:—but a more particular designation also belongs to the present matter. for the faith] This has been variously rendered:

(1) 'according to the faith,' &c., so A. V.: (2) similarly Calvin, Beza, Aret., 'to suit the faith, God's appointment of me and God's prescription of the faith agreeing: (3) 'so as to bring about faith in,' &c. We may at once say that (1) and (2) are inadmissible, as setting up a standard which the Apostle would not have acknowledged for his Apostleship, and as not suiting the mention of the knowledge below, which also belongs to the preposition. Nor does (3) seem quite to be justified by usage. The best sense seems to be that which Luther gives,—that of reference, 'with regard to,' i. e. to bring about, cherish, and perfect. I would render then 'for: Paul, a servant of God, but [and] an Apostle of Christ Jesus, for the faith of the elect of God (those whom God has chosen of the world:

and their faith is the only true faith—the only faith which the apostolic office would subserve), and the thorough knowledge (to promote the knowledge) of the truth which is according to (belongs to,—is conversant in and coincident with: for, as Chrysostom says, "there is a truth of things which is not according to godliness, e. g. the knowledge of husbandry, or of arts, is a knowledge of truth: but this is truth according to godliness") godliness;

2.] in (on condition of, in a state of) hope of life eternal (to what are these words to be referred? Not back to the word "apostle," regarding them as a co-ordinate clause with "for the faith," &c.:—not to the latter part of ver. 1, as subordinate to it—nor to the word "godliness," nor to any one portion of the preceding sentence: for by such reference we develop an inferior member of the former sentence into what evidently is an expansion of the main current of thought, and thus give rise to a disproportion:—but to the whole, from "for the faith" down to "godliness," as subordinate to that whole, and further conditioning or defining it: as if it were, that the elect of God may believe and thoroughly know the truth which is according to piety, in hope of eternal life), which (eternal life: not the truth, nor the hope) God, who cannot lie (see Heb. vi. 18), promised before eternal times (the very distinct use of this same expression in 2 Tim. i. 9, where the meaning 'from ancient times' is precluded, should have kept Commentators from endeavouring to fix that sense on the words here. The solution of the difficulty, that no promise was actually made till the race of man existed, must be found by regarding, as in the place in 2 Tim., the construction as a mixed one,—compounded of the actual promise made in time, and the divine purpose from which that promise sprung, fixed in eternity. Thus, as there God is said to have given us grace in Christ from eternal ages, meaning that the gift took place as the result of a divine purpose fixed from eternity, so here He is said to have promised eternal life before eternal times, meaning that the promise took place as the result of a purpose fixed from eternity); <sup>3</sup>] but (contrast to the eternal and hidden purpose, and to the promise, just mentioned) made manifest in its own seasons (not, 'His own seasons:'—the times belonging to it,—fixed by Him for the manifestation) His word (we naturally expect the same object as before, viz. eternal life: but we have instead, His word,—i. e. the Gospel, see Rom. xvi. 25) in (as the element or vehicle of its manifestation) the proclamation (see 2 Tim. iv. 17), with which I was entrusted according to (in pursuance of) the command of our Saviour God; <sup>4</sup>] to Titus (see Introd. § i.), my true (genuine, see on 1 Tim.

children (for he who cannot bring his own children to the faith, how shall he bring others?) who are not under (involved in) accusation of profligacy (see Eph. v. 18, note), or insubordinate (respecting the reason of these conditions affecting his household, see 1 Tim. iii. 4. I have treated in the Introd. § i., the argument which Baur and De Wette have drawn from these descriptions for dating our Epistles in the second century).

<sup>7</sup> ff.] For it behoves a bishop (or, overseer: see note, 1 Tim. iii. 2; here most plainly identified with the presbyter spoken of before. So Theodoret: "Hence it is plain that they called the presbyters, bishops") to be under no accusation, as God's steward (see 1 Tim. iii. 15, to which image, that of a responsible servant and dispensator [1 Pet. iv. 10] in the house of God, the allusion perhaps is, rather than to that of 1 Cor. iv. 1. There is clearly no allusion to the bishop's own household, as some suppose. Mack well remarks, meaning perhaps however more than the words convey, "God's steward—consequently spiritual superiors are not merely servants and commissioned agents of the Church. According to the Apostle's teaching, church government does not grow up out of the ground"), not selfwilled ("a bishop who would command the affections of those whom he governs, must not be self-willed, so as to act on his own opinion and without the mind of those whom he rules. For that would be tyrannical." Theophylact), not soon provoked, not a brawler, not a striker (for both these, see 1 Tim. iii. 3, notes), not greedy of gain (1 Tim. iii. 8, note); but a lover of hospitality (1 Tim. iii. 2, note, and 3 John 5),

It is hardly likely to mean a lover of good men, coming so immediately after "a lover of hospitality"), self-restrained (or, sober-minded, see 1 Tim. ii. 9, note. I am not satisfied with these renderings, but adopt them for want of a better: discreet is perhaps preferable), just, holy (see on these, and their distinction, in notes on Eph. iv. 24: 1 Thess. ii. 10), continent (here, though that is the primary meaning, the sense need not be limited to sexual continence, but may be spread over the whole range of the indulgences); holding fast (constantly keeping to, and not letting go.—Then how are we to take the following words? Is the faithful word according to the teaching equivalent to (1) the word which is faithful according to the teaching, or (2) the faithful word which is according to the teaching? (1) is taken by Wiesinger and Conybeare [the words which are faithful to (?) our teaching]: (2) by Chrysostom, Theophylact, and almost all Commentators, and I believe rightly. For, to omit the reason derived from the arrangement of the original, the epithet faithful, absolute, is so commonly attached to a saying in these Epistles [1 Tim. i. 15; iii. 1; iv. 9: 2 Tim. ii. 11: ch. iii. 8] as to incline us, especially with the above reason, to take it absolutely here also. I therefore render accordingly) the faithful (true, trustworthy, see note on 1 Tim. i. 15) word (which is) according to (measured by, or in accordance with) the instruction [which he has received], that he may be able both to exhort (believers) in (the element of his exhortation) the sound doctrine (the teaching which is healthy), and to rebuke (see ver. 13 below) the gainsayers.

10—16.] By occasion of the last clause, the Apostle goes on to describe the nature of the adversaries to whom he alludes, especially with reference to Crete.

10.] For (explains "the gainsayers" of ver. 9) there are many insubordinate vain talkers (see 1 Tim. i. 6, and ch. iii. 9) and deceivers (see Gal. vi. 3: deceivers of men's minds), chiefly (not only—there were some such of the Gentile converts) they of the circumcision (i. e. not Jews, but Jewish Christians: for he is speaking of seducers within the Church: compare ver. 11): whose mouths it is necessary to stop (by rebuking them sharply, see below), such men as ("inasmuch as they," Ellicott: which perhaps is logically better) overturn (2 Tim. i. 18) whole houses (i. e. "pervert whole families." Theophylact calls these perverters "the devil's crowsbars, with which he pulls down the houses of God"), teaching things which are not fitting for the sake of base gain (see 1 Tim. vi. 5).

12.] One of them (not, of the "many" spoken of above,—nor of them of the circumcision: but of the inhabitants of Crete, to which both belonged), their own prophet (see below), said, "The Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, sloth bellies" (Theophylact ascribes the saying to EPIMENIDES; and so also Chrysostom, Epiphanius, and Jerome. But Theodoret ascribes the verse to Callimachus, in whose Hymn to Zeus, ver. 8, the words "the Cretans are always liars" are found. To this however Jerome [as also Epiphanius] answers, that Callimachus took the words from Epimenides.—EPIMENIDES was a native of Phæstus in Crete, and lived about 600 B.C. He was sent for to Athens to undertake the purification of the city from the pollution occasioned by Cylon (see articles 'Epimenides' and 'Cylon,' in the Dict. of Biography and Mythology), and is said to have lived to an extreme old age, and to have been buried at Lacedæmon. The appellation 'prophet' seems to have belonged to him in its literal sense: Cicero describes him as one of those who in an excitement of mind, or by its free motion, foretold future events: and Apuleius calls him an illustrious declarer of the fates, and a poet. And Diogenes Laertius tells us that the Cretans sacrificed to him as a god.—On the character here given of the Cretans, see Introd. to this Epistle, § ii. 9 ff. slothful bellies is said of those who by indulging their bodily appetites have become corpulent and indolent).

13.] This testimony is true. Wherefore reprove them sharply ("for," says Chrysostom, "such people want strong and cutting words: mildness has no effect on them"), that they may be healthy in the faith (the Cretans indicated here, who are to be thus rebuked in order to their soundness in the faith, are manifestly not the false teachers, but the ordinary believers: compare ver. 14); <sup>14</sup>] not giving attention to Jewish fables (on the probable nature of these, see 1 Tim. i. 4 note: and on the whole subject, the Introd. to these Epistles, § i. 12 ff. 15.] The Apostle's own answer to those who would enforce these commandments. All things (absolutely—all things with which man can be concerned) are pure to the pure ("God created nothing impure: for nothing is impure except sin only: for this lays hold of the soul, and defiles it," Chrysostom. See Matt. xxiii. 26: Luke xi. 41. There is no ground whatever for supposing this to be a maxim of the false teachers, quoted by the Apostle, any more than the "all things are lawful for me" of 1 Cor. vi. 12, where see note. The maxim here is a truly Christian one of the noblest order.—As usual in these Epistles [see Introd. § i. 38], purity is inseparably connected with soundness in the faith, compare Acts xv. 9,—and 1 Tim. iv. 3, where our words, "to the pure," are expanded into "those who are faithful and know the truth"): but to the polluted and unbelieving (see the preceding remarks) nothing is pure; but both (or 'even,' as A. V.:—but the other seems preferable, on account of the close correspondence of the two faculties mentioned) their mind (their rational part, Eph. iv. 17, which presides over and leads all the determinate acts and thoughts of the man) and their conscience is polluted (and therefore, uncleanness tainting their rational acts and their reflective self-recognitions, nothing can be pure to them: every occasion becomes to them an occasion of sin, every creature of God an instrument of sin; as Mack well observes, "The relation, in which the sinful subject stands to the objects of its possession or of its inclination, is a sinful one").

16.] Expansion of the last clause, shewing their conscious life of falsehood. They make confession (openly, in sight of men: but not so only—their confession is a true one so far, that they have the knowledge, and believe it: not 'they profess,' as A. V.) that they know God; but in (or, by) their works they deny (Him) (not 'it,' see 2 Tim. ii. 12), being abominable (see Luke xvi. 15), and disobedient, and for (or, unto: towards the accomplishing of) every good work worthless (or, reprobate).

CH. II. 1—III. 11.] Directions to Titus, how to exhort the believers of various classes, and how to comport himself. For intermediate divisions, see below.

1.] But (contrast to the persons just described: "on the other hand") do thou speak (not what they speak, ch. i. 11: but) the things which befit the sound doctrine (that doctrine which is sound and wholesome, not teaching things which ought not to be taught): viz. that the aged men (not presbyters, which implies eldership, and not old age only) be sober (see note on 1 Tim. iii. 2), grava

The verb here is that cognate to the substantive used there) the young women to be lovers of their husbands, lovers of their children, discreet (this term certainly applies better to women than self-restrained, which has been proposed as a rendering: there is in this latter, in their case, an implication of effort, which destroys the spontaneity, and brushes off, so to speak, the bloom of this best of female graces. See, however, note on 1 Tim. ii. 9. The word is one of our greatest difficulties), chaste workers at home (the word is not found elsewhere, and has perhaps on that account been changed to the more usual one, which signifies stayers at home), good (Theophylact joins this with the last,—good keepers at home. So also the old Syriac version. But it seems better to preserve the series of single epithets, till broken in the next clause by the construction. As a single epithet, it seems to provide, that their keeping, or working, at home, should not degenerate into churlishness or niggardliness), in subjection to their own (inserted to bring out and impress the duties they owe to them—so in Eph. v. 22) husbands, that the word of God (the Gospel) be not ill-spoken of (“for their leaving their husbands under pretence of religion brought scandal on the preaching of the Gospel.” Theodoret).

6 ff.] The younger men in like manner exhort to be sober-minded (see above, ver. 5, and 1 Tim. ii. 9, note), shewing thyself in (concerning) all matters an example of good works (refl.): in thy teaching, (shewing) incorruption (it is difficult exactly to fix the reference of this word. It may be objective, of the contents of the teaching—that it should set forth purity as its character and aim: or subjective, that he should be, in his teaching, pure in motive, uncorrupted: so Wiesinger, comparing 2 Cor. xi. 3. Huther takes it of the form of the teaching, that it should be pure from all expressions foreign to the character of the Gospel. This is perhaps hardly satisfactory: and the first interpretation would

The latter clause of ver. 10, it is true, gives occasion to this declaration; but the reference of these verses is far wider than merely to slaves) the grace of God (that divine favour to men, of which the whole process of Redemption was a proof: not to be limited to Christ's Incarnation: though certainly this may be said for that interpretation, that it may also be regarded as a term inclusive of all the blessings of Redemption: but it does not follow, that of two such inclusive terms, the one may be substituted for the other) was manifested bringing salvation to all men (this "to all men" follows "bringing salvation," not as A.V., "was manifested." Worldly, belonging to that world which lieth in the wicked one, and is without God: see 1 John ii. 15—17), we might live soberly, and justly (better than 'righteously,'—'righteous,' by its forensic objective sense in St. Paul, introducing a confusion, where the question is of moral rectitude), and godly, in the present life (as St. Bernard says, soberly respects ourselves,—justly, our neighbour,—godly, our God.—These three comprising our discipline in faith and love, he now comes to hope); looking for the blessed hope (here, as in Gal. v. 5, Col. i. 5 al., nearly objective,—the hope, as embodying the thing hoped for), and manifestation (hope and manifestation belong together) of the glory (Chrysostom says, "He speaks here of two manifestations; the former of grace, the latter of glory." Nothing could be more unfortunate than the rendering of the A. V., "glorious appearing," by which the whole sense is obscured) of the great God (the Father: see below) and of our Saviour Jesus Christ (as regards the sense, an exact parallel is found in Matt. xvi. 27, "The Son of man is about to come in the glory of His Father," compared with Matt. xxv. 31, "When the Son of man shall come in His glory." See also 1 Pet. iv. 13. The glory which shall be revealed at the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ is His own glory, and that of His Father [John xvii. 3; 1 Thess. iii. 13]. This sense has been obscured by the foolish rendering of the A. V.: see above. And we now come to consider the meaning of the words the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ. Two views have been taken of them: (1) that the great God and our Saviour are to be taken together as the description of Jesus Christ,—'of Jesus Christ, the great God and our Saviour;' (2) that, as given above, the great God describes the Father, and our Saviour Jesus Christ the Son. It is obvious that in dealing with (1), we shall be deciding with regard to (2) also. (1) has been the view of the Greek orthodox Fathers, and of most ancient and modern Commentators. That the former so interpreted the words, is obviously not [as it has been considered] decisive of the question, if they can be shewn to bear legitimately another meaning, and that meaning to be the one most likely to have been in the mind of the writer. The passage must be argued primarily on its own ground, not primarily on the consensus of the Greek Fathers. No one disputes that it may mean that which they have interpreted it: and there were obvious reasons why they, having licence to do so, should choose this interpretation. But it is our object, not being swayed, in this or any other interpretation, by doctrinal considerations one way or the other, to enquire, not what the words may mean, but what they do mean, as far as we may be able to ascertain it.—I have in my Greek Test. argued first from the construction of the sentence, and then from the Apostle's usage of the expression "God our Saviour:," and from both of these considerations I have deduced that it is not probable he meant to apply the whole of this to our Lord, but the former portion to the Father, and the latter to the Son. The reasoning on the second point may be intelligible to the English reader. The expression "God our Saviour" occurs six times in these Epistles, once in Luke [i. 47], and once in the Epistle of Jude. If the writer here identifies this expression, 'the great God and our Saviour,' with the Lord Jesus Christ, calling Him 'God and our Saviour,' it will be at least probable that in other places where he speaks of "God our Saviour," he also designates our Lord Jesus Christ. Now is that so? On the contrary, in 1 Tim. i. 1, we have the command of God our Saviour and of Christ Jesus our hope: where I suppose none will deny that the Father and the Son are most plainly distinguished from one another. The same is the case in 1 Tim. ii. 3—5, a passage bearing much [see below] on the interpretation of this one; and consequently in 1 Tim. iv. 10, where “is the Saviour of all men” corresponds to “willeth all to be saved” in the other. So also in Titus i. 3, where “our Saviour God,” by whose “command” the promise of eternal life was manifested, with the proclamation of which St. Paul was entrusted, is the same “eternal God,” by whose “command” the hidden mystery was manifested in Rom. xvi. 26, where the same distinction is made. The only place where there could be any doubt is in our ver. 10, which possible doubt however is removed by ver. 11, where the same assertion is made, of the revelation of the hidden grace of God [the Father]. Then we have our own ch. iii. 4—6, where we find “our Saviour God” in ver. 4, clearly defined as the Father, and “through Jesus Christ our Saviour” in ver. 6. In the one passage of St. Jude, the distinction is equally clear: for there we have “to the only God our Saviour, through Jesus Christ our Lord.” It is plain then, that the usage of the words ‘God our Saviour’ does not make it probable that the whole expression here is to be applied to the Lord Jesus Christ. And in estimating this probability, let us again recur to 1 Tim. ii. 3, 5, a passage which runs very parallel with the present one. We read there, “For there is one God, | and one Mediator between God and men, Christ Jesus, himself man, who gave Himself a ransom,” &c. Compare this with “the great God | and our Saviour Jesus Christ, who gave Himself a ransom for us,” &c. Can there be a reasonable doubt, that the Apostle writing two sentences so closely corresponding, on a point of such high importance, would have in his view the same distinction in the second of them, which he so strongly lays down in the first?—Without then considering the question as closed, I would submit that (2) satisfies all the requirements of the sentence: that it is both structurally and contextually more probable, and more agreeable to the Apostle’s way of writing: and I have therefore preferred it. Whichever way taken, the passage is just as important a testimony to the divinity of our Saviour: according to (1), by asserting His possession of Deity and right to the appellation of the Highest: according to (2), even more strikingly, asserting His equality in glory with the Father, in a way which would be blasphemy if predicated of any of the sons of men); who (our Saviour Jesus Christ) gave Himself (“the forcible ‘Himself, His whole self, the greatest gift ever given,’ must not be overlooked.” Ellicott) for us (‘on our behalf,’ not ‘in our stead’), that He might (by this assertion of the Redeemer’s purpose, we return to the moral aim of verses 11, 12, more plainly indicated as in close connexion with Christ’s propitiatory sacrifice) redeem (‘buy off with a price.’ See note, 1 Tim. ii. 6: and compare 1 Pet. i. 18, where the price is stated to have been the precious blood of Christ) us from all iniquity (lawlessness: see 1 John iii. 4, “sin is lawlessness”), and might purify (by this statement that the Redeemer’s object was to purify to Himself a peculiar people, and not “us” merely, His purpose is lifted off from our particular case, and generally and objectively stated) to Himself a people peculiarly His (see note on Eph. i. 14; also 1 Pet. ii. 9), zealous (an ardent worker and promoter) of good works.

15.] gathers up all since ver. 1, where the general command last appeared, and enforces it on Titus. In ch. iii. 1, the train of thought is again resumed.—These things (the foregoing: not, the following) speak, and exhort (in the case of those who believe and need stirring up), and rebuke (in the case of those who are rebellious) with

III. 1, 2.] Rules concerning behaviour to those without.—Put them in mind (as of a duty previously and otherwise well known, but liable to be forgotten) to be in subjection to governments, to authorities, to obey magistrates, to be ready towards every good work (the connexion seems to be as in Rom. xiii. 3, where the rulers are said to be not a terror to the good works, but to the evil. Jerome and others suppose these exhortations to subjection to have found their occasion in the insubordination of the Jews on principle to foreign rule, and more especially of the Cretan Jews. In the presence of similar exhortations in the Epistle to the Romans and elsewhere, we can hardly perhaps say so much as this: but certainly the quotations given by Wetstein seem to establish the fact of Cretan turbulence in general), to speak evil of no one (these words set forth the general duty, but are perhaps introduced owing to what has preceded; compare 2 Pet. ii. 10; Jude 8), to be not quarrelsome, forbearing (note on Phil. iv. 5. "The forbearing man must have been, it is to be feared, a somewhat exceptional character in Crete, where an innate covetousness, exhibited in outward acts of (emphatic) did (not, 'have done,' as A. V., nor 'had done,'—which in fact obscures the meaning: for God's act here spoken of was a definite act in time—and its application to us, also a definite act in time [see below]; and if we take this verb as pluperfect, we confine the Apostle's repudiation of our works, as moving causes of those acts of God, to the time previous to those acts. For aught that this pluperfect would assert, our salvation might be prompted on God's part by future works of righteousness which He foresaw we should do. Whereas the simple past tense throws the whole into the same time.—"His goodness, &c. was manifested . . . not for works which we did . . . He saved us,"—and renders the repudiation of human merit universal), but according to (after the measure of, in pursuance of, after the promptings of) His compassion He saved us (this saved us must be referred back to the definite objective act of God in Redemption, which has been above mentioned. On the part of God, that act is one—in the application of it to individuals, it is composed of many and successive acts. But this being contemporaneous with the verb appeared above, cannot apply to our individual salvation alone. At the same time, standing as it does in a transitional position, between God's objective act and the subjective individual application of it, it no doubt looks forward as well as backward—to individual realization of salvation, as well as to the divine completion of it once for all in Christ.—The "us" here is not all mankind, which would be inconsistent with what follows, —nor all Christians, however true that would be,—but the same as are indicated by "and we" above,—the particular Christians in the Apostle's view as he was writing —Titus and his Cretan converts, and himself), by means of the laver (not 'washing,' as A. V., which the word cannot mean by any possibility: but always a vessel, or pool in which washing takes place. Here, the baptismal font: see on Eph. v. 26) of regeneration (first, let us treat of this word. It occurs only in Matt. xix. 28, and there in an objective sense, whereas here it is evidently subjective. There it is the great second birth of heaven and earth in the latter days: here the second birth of the individual man. Though not occurring elsewhere in this sense, it has its cognate expressions. Then, of the genitive, of regeneration. The font is the 'laver of regeneration,' because it is the vessel consecrated to the use of that Sacrament whereby, in its completeness as a Sacrament [see below], the new life unto God is conveyed. And inasmuch as it is in that font, and when we are in it, that the first breath of that life is drawn, it is the font of,—belonging to, pertaining to, setting forth,—regeneration.—Observe, there is here no figure: the words are literal: Baptism is taken as in all its completion,—the outward visible sign accompanied by the inward spiritual grace; and as thus complete, it not only represents, but is, the new birth. The font then, the laver of regeneration, representing the external portion of the Sacrament, and pledging the internal,—that inward and spiritual grace, necessary to the completion of the Sacrament and its regenerating power, is not, as too often, left to follow as a matter of course, and thus baptismal regeneration rendered a mere formal and unmeaning thing, 'ex opere operato,'—but is distinctly stated in the following words), and (understand through again: so Theodoret and Bengel, who says, "Two things are spoken of: the laver of regeneration, which is a way of expressing baptism into Christ, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost." On the other hand, most Commentators [see Elliott here] take renewing as a second genitive after font (of regeneration and of the renewing, &c.) the renewal (the word is used of the gradual renewal of heart and life in the image of God, following upon the new birth, and without which the birth is a mere abortion, not leading on to vitality and action. It is here treated as potentially involved in God's act of saving us. We must not, for the sake of making it contemporaneous with the laver of baptism, give it another and untenable meaning, that of mere incipient spiritual life) of (brought about by; genitive of the efficient cause) the Holy Spirit (who alone can renew unto life in progressive sanctification. mere outward act or fact of baptism to which we attach such high and glorious epithets, but that complete baptism by water and the Holy Ghost, whereof the first cleansing by water is indeed the ordinary sign and seal, but whereof the glorious indwelling Spirit of God is the only efficient cause and continuous agent. 'BAPTISMAL REGENERATION' is the distinguishing doctrine of the new covenant [Matt. iii. 11]: but let us take care that we know and bear in mind what 'baptism' means: not the mere ecclesiastical act, not the mere fact of reception by that act among God's professing people; but that, completed by the divine act, manifested by the operation of the Holy Ghost in the heart and through the life. It should be a caution to those persons who revile this doctrine, entirely mistaking its purport and tendency, that they have the most direct and emphatic testimony of Holy Scripture against them); 6.] which (or, rather, whom; the Holy Spirit, not the water) He poured out on us richly (again, it is mere waste of time to debate whether this pouring out be the one general one at Pentecost, or that in the heart of each individual believer: the one was God's objective act once for all, in which all its subjective exemplifications and applications were potentially enwrapped) through (as its channel and medium, He having purchased it for us, and made the pouring out possible, in and by His own blessed Sacrifice in our nature) Jesus Christ our Saviour (which title was used of the Father above: of Him,—ultimately: of our Lord,—immediately); 7.] in order that (the sentence may express the aim either of His saving us [Bengel, De Wette, Huther, Elliott], or of His pouring out the Spirit on us: more naturally, I believe, of the latter. Theologically, this statement of purpose is exact: the effusion of the Spirit has for its purpose the conviction of sin and manifestation of the righteousness of Christ, out of which two spring justifying faith) having been justified by His (this by this time, they had become so definite and established, as to have their acknowledged adherents, their “hereties.” See also 2 Pet. ii. 1. “It should be observed,” says Conybeare, “that these early heretics united moral depravity with erroneous teaching: their works bore witness against their doctrine”), after one and a second admonition, decline (intercourse with: there is no precept concerning excommunication: this was to be a subjective act); knowing that such an one is thoroughly perverted, and is a sinner (is living in sin: the expression gives the force of habit), being (at the same time) self-condemned (compare 1 Tim. iv. 2, note, —with his own conscience branded with the foul mark of depravity).

His, referring to the more remote subject, must be used here not of our Lord, who has just been mentioned, but of the Father: and so usually, the grace of God [Acts xi. 23; xx. 24, 32: Rom. v. 15: 1 Cor. i. 4, &c.] is the efficient cause of our justification in Christ) grace, we might become heirs (see especially Gal. iii. 20) according to (in pursuance of, consistently with, so that the inheritance does not disappoint, but fully accomplishes and satisfies the hope) the hope of eternal life (some Commentators would arrange this, heirs—according to the (our) hope—of eternal life. The objection brought against joining hope of eternal life together, is, that thus heirs would stand alone. But it does thus stand alone in every place where St. Paul uses it in the spiritual sense; viz. Rom. iv. 14; viii. 17 twice ["of God" does not belong to it in this sense]: Gal. iii. 29; iv. 1, 9: and therefore why not here?).

see Introd. to Col. § ii. 7. 2.] Apphia is the Latin name Appia. She appears to have been the wife of Philemon; certainly, as well as Archippus, she must have belonged to his family, or they would hardly be thus specially addressed in a private letter concerning a family matter.

Archippus] see Col. iv. 17. fellow-soldier] see reff. and 2 Tim. ii. 3. He was perhaps Philemon's son: or a family friend: or the minister of the family: the former hypothesis being perhaps the most probable, as the letter concerns a family matter; but see on next clause. To what grade in the ministry he belonged, it is idle to enquire: nor does Col. iv. 17 furnish us with any data. the church in thy house] This appears to have consisted not merely of the family itself, but of a certain assembly of Christians who met in the house of Philemon: see the same expression in Col. iv. 15, of Nymphas: and in Rom. xvi. 3—5; 1 Cor. xvi. 19, of Aquila and Priscilla. Meyer remarks the tact of the Apostle, in associating with Philemon those connected with his house, but not going beyond the limits of the house.

as usually constructed, to ver. 4. The mixing of prayer and thanksgiving in that clause does not exclude the idea of intercessory prayer. To join "that the communication," &c., with ver. 5, is flat in the extreme, and perfectly inconceivable as a piece of St. Paul's writing. In order that the communication of thy faith (with others) may become effectual in (as the element in which it works) the thorough knowledge (entire appreciation and experiential recognition by us) of every good thing (good gifts and graces, compare Rom. vii. 18, the negation of this in the carnal man) which is in us to (the glory of; connect with "may become effectual") Christ [Jesus]. 7.] The for gives a reason for the prayer of ver. 6, not for the thanksgiving of ver. 4: see above.

in Christ, as usual, the element in which the boldness found place. that which is fitting, a delicate hint, that the reception of Onesimus was to be classed under this category. 9. for love's sake] is not to be restricted to 'this thy love' (of ver. 7), or 'our mutual love,' but is quite general—'that Christian love, of which thou shewest so bright an example:' ver. 7. Being such . . .] reason for the rather—'I prefer this way, as the more efficacious, being such an one, &c.' I believe Meyer is right in maintaining that "such an one" cannot be taken as preparatory to "as," "such an one, as . . .," as in A. V., and commonly. I have therefore punctuated accordingly, as has Ellie. The rendering will be: Being such an one (as declared in the preferring beseeching for love's sake to commanding)—as (1) Paul the aged, and (2) now a prisoner also of Christ Jesus (the fact of his calling himself Paul the aged is interesting, as connected with the date of this Epistle and those to Eph. and Col.: see Intro. to Eph. § iv.), I beseech thee, &c.

11.] The English reader must be informed that the name Onesimus signifies profitable. And here, as beyond doubt in ver. 20, there certainly appears to be a play on the name, although for the words profitable and unprofitable he does not here use the same root as occurs in Onesimus (in ver. 20 he does). He had been unprofitable in having run away, and apparently (ver. 18) defrauded his master as well. But the profit must not be limited to the sense of outward profit, but extended to a spiritual meaning as well—profitable to me, as the fruit of my ministry,—to thee as a servant, and also as a Christian brother (ver. 16).

12. mine own (literally) bowels] There does not appear to be any allusion to the fact of sonship in this figure, as Chrysostom and Theodoret think: for thus the spiritual similitude would be confused, being here introduced materially. But the expression more probably means, mine own heart—'as dear to me as mine own heart.' As to the construction (see var. readd.), it is an anacoluthon: the Apostle goes off into the relative clause, and loses sight, as so often, of the construction with which he began: taking it up again at ver. 17. 13.]

I, emphatic, I, for my part. in thy stead] For, wert thou here, thou wouldst minister to me: I was minded therefore to retain him in thy place. in the bonds of the gospel] Explained well by Theodoret, "Thou owest me service as a disciple to a master, and a master who preaches divine things:" not without allusion also to the fetters which the Gospel had laid on himself. 14.] but without thy decision (consent) I was willing to do nothing (general expression, but meant to apply only to the particular thing in hand; 'nothing in the matter'); that thy good (service towards me: but not in this particular only: the expression is general—the particular case would serve as an example of it) might be not as (appearing as if it were) of (after the fashion of, according to) necessity, but of free will.

<sup>15.</sup> perhaps is delicately said, to conciliate Philemon. departed ["He uses a mild word in calling his flight a departure, to avoid irritating his master." Theophylact. The reference seems to be to Gen. xlv. 5, where Joseph suggests the purpose which God's providence had in sending him down into Egypt. <sup>for a season</sup>] Much has been built upon this, as indicating that the Epistle was written not so far from Colossæ as Rome: but without ground: the contrast is between "for a season" and "eternally," which is to be interpreted "not in this life only, but in that which is to come." receive him] It is the same word as that used in Matt. vi. 2—mayest have him for thine own—possess him fully, entirely.

<sup>16.</sup>] And that, in a different relation from the one before subsisting. But no longer as a servant does not imply his manumission; rather the contrary:—"no longer as a slave (though he be one), but above a slave." specially] 'Of all other men,' of all those without thy house, with whom he has been connected: but how much more "to thee," with whom he stands in so near and lasting a relation.

<sup>17.</sup>] takes up again the sentiment (and the construction) broken off at the end of ver. 12. The partnership referred to is that shewn by the love of him, common to both, mentioned in the last verse: but extending far wider than it, even to the community of faith, and hope, and love between them as Christian men. <sup>18.</sup>] But, in contrast to the favourable reception bespoken for him in the last verse. "Onesimus had confessed to Paul what he had done." Bengel. "He says not, if he hath stolen aught; but, if he hath wronged thee in aught. Here is the sin at the same time confessed, and not as the sin of a slave, but as of a friend against a friend, using rather the name of a wrong than of a theft." Chrysostom:—that reckon, or impute to me: hardly perhaps, notwithstanding the engagement of the next verse, with a view to actual repayment, but rather to inducing Philemon to forego exacting it.

that I say not] "This is a kind of reticence, when we say that we wish to omit that very thing which we wish most to say," Grotius. Elliott's paraphrases, 'repay: yes I say this, not

thine own self] Not thy goods merely. This shews that Philemon had been converted by St. Paul in person.

20.] Yea, as so often when we make requests, asserts our assent with the subject of the request: so Phil. iv. 3, and elsewhere. Me and thee are both emphatic—and the verb have profit (onaimên; see above on ver. 11) is an evident allusion to the name Onesimus. The sentiment itself is a reference to what had just been said, "Thou owest thine own self to me:"—this being so, let me have profit of thee: yet not in worldly gain, but in the Lord—in thine increase and richness in the graces of His Spirit. refresh (viz. by acceding to my request) my heart (as above—the seat of the affections) in Christ (as "in the Lord" above). 21.] serves to put Philemon in mind of the apostolic authority with which he writes: and hints delicately (perhaps: but this may be doubtful) at the manumission of Onesimus, which he has not yet requested.

22.] But at the same time (as thou fillest my request) also . . . We may, perhaps, take this direction as serving to secure the favourable reception of Onesimus: for the Apostle would himself come and see how his request had fared. "For great would be the favour and honour shewn by Paul's visit, Paul after his accession of years, Paul after his bonds," Chrysostom. Or it may be, as Ellicott, that Philemon was not to consider the Epistle as a mere petition for Onesimus, but as containing special messages on other matters to himself. Your and you refer to those named in vv. 1, 2. 23—25.]

CONCLUSION. See on Col. iv. 10, 12, 14, where the same persons send greeting. Jesus called Justus (Col. iv. 11) does not appear here. 25.] On all matters regarding the date and circumstances of writing the Epistle, see the Introduction.

IN consequence of some remarks made in critiques on the former part of this Volume, the reader is again reminded, that the differences between the rendering in the text, and that given in the notes, are not accidental, but intentional. The text is an English Version, conformed to English idiom: while the notes put the reader in possession, as well as our tongue will allow, of the original form of the expression. Thus frequently the rendering in the notes will admit of several senses, of which the version is compelled to adopt only one.

CHAPTER XV.

THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS.

ITS AUTHORSHIP.

1. THE most proper motto to prefix to this section would be that saying of Origen,

“If then any church professes this Epistle as being Paul’s, let it have credit for the circumstance : for not in vain have the ancients handed it down as Paul’s ; but who wrote<sup>1</sup> the Epistle, God alone knows the truth.”

2. For these latter words represent the state of our knowledge at this day. There is a certain amount of evidence, both external, from tradition, and internal, from approximation in some points to his acknowledged Epistles, which points to St. Paul as its author. But when we come to examine the former of these, it will be seen that the tradition gives way beneath us in regard of authenticity and trustworthiness ; and as we search into the latter, the points of similarity are overborne by a far greater number of indications of divergence, and of incompatibility, both in style and matter, with the hypothesis of the Pauline authorship.

3. There is one circumstance which, though this is the most notable instance of it, is not unfamiliar to the unbiassed conductor of enquiries into the difficulties of Holy Scripture ; viz. that, in modern times at least, most has been taken for granted by those who knew least about the matter, and the strongest assertions always made by men who have never searched into, or have been unable to appreciate, the evidence. Genuine research has led, in almost every instance, to a modified holding, or to an entire rejection, of the Pauline hypothesis.

4. It will be my purpose, in the following paragraphs, to deal (following the steps of many who have gone before me, and more especially of Bleek) with the various hypotheses in order, as to both their external and internal evidence. It will be impossible in citing the external evidence, to keep these hypotheses entirely distinct : that which is cited as against one will frequently be for another which is not under treatment, and must be referred back to on reaching that one.

5. As preliminary then to all such specific considerations, we will enquire first into the external and traditional ground, then into that which is internal, arising from the Epistle itself, of the supposition that ST. PAUL was the Author and Writer, or the Author without being the Writer, of the Epistle.

6. Some think that they see an allusion to our Epistle in 2 Pet. iii. 15, 16. But to this there are several objections; among which the principal is, that no passages can be pointed out in our Epistle answering to the description there given. This point has not been much pressed, even by those who have raised it; being doubtless felt to be too insecure to build any safe conclusion upon.

7. The same may be said of the idea that our Epistle is alluded to by St. James, ch. ii. 24, 25. Hug supposes that the citation of Rahab as justified by works is directly polemical, and aimed at Heb. xi. 31. But as Bleek well remarks, even were we to concede the polemical character of the citation, why need Heb. xi. 31 be fixed on as its especial point of attack? Was it not more than probable, that the followers of St. Paul would have adduced this, among other examples, in their oral teaching?

8. We come then to the first undoubted allusions to the Epistle; which occur in the Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians, dating before the conclusion of the first century. Clement is well acquainted with the Epistles of St. Paul: he quotes by name 1 Cor.; he closely imitates Rom. i. 29—32: he frequently alludes to other passages. But of no Epistle does he make such large and constant use, as of this to the Hebrews: and this is testified by Eusebius,—“in which (i. e. his Epistle to the Corinthians) he brings forward many thoughts out of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and even some passages out of it verbatim, thus shewing clearly that the work was no new one in his time.” The same is testified by Jerome also.

9. Now some have argued from this that, as Clement thus reproduces passages of this as well as of other Epistles confessedly canonical, he must have held this to be canonical, and if he, then the Roman church, in whose name he writes; and if canonical, then written by St. Paul. But Bleek well observes, that this whole argument is built on an unhistorical assumption respecting the Canon of the New Test., which was certainly not settled in Clement's time; and that, in fact, his use of this Epistle proves no more than that it was well known and exceedingly valued by him. It is a weighty testimony for the Epistle, but says nothing as to its Author<sup>2</sup>.

10. The first notices in any way touching the question of the authorship meet us after the middle of the second century. And it is remarkable enough, that from these notices we must gather, that at that early date there were the same various views respecting it, in the main, which now prevail; the same doubt whether St. Paul was the author, or some other Teacher of the apostolic age; and if some other, then what part St. Paul had, or whether any, in influencing his argument or dictating his matter.

11. The earliest of these testimonies is that of PANTENUS, the chief of the catechetical school in Alexandria about the middle of the second century. There is a passage preserved to us by Eusebius from a lost work of Clement of Alexandria, in which the latter says that the blessed Presbyter said, that since our Lord was the real Apostle to the Hebrews, St. Paul, out of modesty, and as being himself sent to the Gentiles, did not attach his name to this Epistle<sup>3</sup>.

12. There can be no doubt that by the blessed Presbyter here, Clement means Pantænus. Eusebius tells us of Clement, that he in this lost work reported the sayings of his master Pantænus.

13. Nor can there be any doubt, from these words, that Pantænus believed the Epistle to be the work of St. Paul. But as Bleek observes, we have no data to enable us to range this testimony in its right place as regards the controversy. Being totally unacquainted with the context in which it occurs, we cannot say whether it represents an opinion of Pantænus's own, or a general persuasion; whether it is adduced polemically, or merely as solving the problem of the anonymousness of the Epistle for those who already believed St. Paul to be the Author. Nothing can well be more foolish, and beside the purpose, than the reason which it renders for this anonymousness: are we to reckon the assumption of the Pauline authorship in it as a subjectivity of the same mind as devised the other? For aught that this testimony itself says, it may have been so: we can only then estimate it rightly, when we regard it as one of a class, betokening something like consensus on the matter in question.

14. And such a consensus we certainly seem to be able to trace in the writers of the Alexandrian school. CLEMENT himself, both in his works which have come down to us, and in the fragments of his lost works preserved by Eusebius, frequently and expressly cites the Epistle as the work of St. Paul. Nay, his testimony goes further than this. In a well-known passage of Eusebius, he cites from the same lost work of Clement as follows:

“He says that the Epistle to the Hebrews is Paul's, and was written to Hebrews in the Hebrew tongue, and that Luke diligently translated it and published it for the Greeks. From which circumstance it is, that its style has a similarity to that of the Acts. But that Paul very naturally did not prefix ‘Paul the Apostle’ to it, as the Hebrews suspected and disliked him, and so he would not alienate them in the very beginning of his work."

15. Valuable as the above passage is, it fails to point out to us definitively the ground and the extent of the opinion which it expresses. The citations from the Epistle throughout Clement's writings shew us, that his persuasion respecting its having been put into Greek by St. Luke, did not prevent him from every where citing the Greek as the words of St. Paul; either expressly naming him, or indicating him under the words "the [divine] Apostle." But whether the opinion was derived from tradition, or from his own critical research, there is nothing here to inform us. The reference to the similarity of diction to that in the Acts seems rather to point to the latter source. Nor again can we say whether he is representing (1) a general opinion, prevalent as transmitted in the Alexandrian church, or (2) one confined to himself, or (3) one which had spread through the teaching of Pantænus his master. This last is hardly probable, seeing that he gives for the anonymousness of the Epistle a far more sensible reason than that which he immediately after quotes from Pantænus. We can derive from the passage nothing but a surmise respecting the view prevalent in Alexandria at the time. And that surmise would lead us to believe that St. Paul was not there held to have been the writer of the Epistle in its present Greek form, however faithfully that present form may represent his original meaning.

16. We now come to the testimony of ORIGEN; from which, without being able to solve the above historical question, we gain considerably more light on the subject of the tradition respecting the Epistle.

17. In his own ordinary practice in his writings, Origen cites the Epistle as the work of St. Paul, using much the same terms as Clement in so doing: viz. either "Paul" or "the Apostle." In the Homilies on Joshua, he distinctly ascribes fourteen Epistles to St. Paul. But in what sense he makes these citations, we must ascertain by his own more accurately expressed opinion on the matter; from which it will appear, how unfairly Origen has been claimed by superficial arguers for the Pauline authorship, as on their side.

18. Before however coming to this, it may be well to adduce two or three passages in which he indicates the diversity of opinion which prevailed. In his Commentary on Matt. xxiii. 27, speaking of the slaying of the prophets, he cites, as from St. Paul, 1 Thess. i. 14, 15, and Heb. xi. 37, 38; and then adds, "But suppose any one repudiates the Epistle to the Hebrews as not being Paul's." And then after a caution against apocryphal works foisted in by the Jews (among which he clearly does not mean to include our Epistle), he adds, "Still, if any one receives that to the Hebrews as an Epistle of Paul," &c.

Again, in his Epistle to Africanus, in the course of removing the doubt of his friend as to the authenticity of the history of Susanna, he mentions the traditional death of Isaiah, which he says "is testified to by the Epistle to the Hebrews, but is not written in any of the canonical books" (meaning, not that the Epistle was not one of these books, but that the account of Isaiah's martyrdom is not in any canonical book of the Old Test.). Then he adds, "But possibly some who are pressed by this argument may take refuge in the view of those who set aside the Epistle as not written by Paul: and to them we should have to use another argument to shew that the Epistle is Paul's."

It would have been of some interest to know who these some were, and whether their setting aside of the Epistle arose from the absence of ancient tradition as to the Pauline authorship, or from critical conclusions of their own, arrived at from study of the Epistle itself. But of this Origen says nothing.

19. The principal testimony of his own is contained in two fragments of his lost Homilies on this Epistle, preserved by Eusebius: "In these he observes, that the style of the Epistle is not that characteristic of the Apostle, who declared himself unskilful in style; but is more Greek in its form of diction, as every one who knows how to discriminate styles must confess. On the other hand, any one who reads attentively the Apostolic writings must also confess, that the thoughts are marvellous, and no way inferior to the acknowledged writings of the Apostles. After this, he says that the thoughts appear to him to be those of the Apostle, but the diction and style those of some reporter or paraphraser of the things said by his master."

Then follows the sentence cited by us in par. 1. And afterwards he adds, "The account which has come down to us is divided, some reporting that Clement, who became Bishop of Rome, wrote the Epistle, others that it was Luke, who wrote the Gospel and the Acts."

We learn from these remarkable fragments several interesting particulars: among which may be mentioned;

First, Origen's own opinion as to the Epistle, deduced from grounds which he regards as being clear to all who are on the one hand accustomed to judge of style, and, on the other, versed in the apostolic writings; viz. that its Author in its present form is not St. Paul, but some one who has embodied in his own style and form the thoughts of that Apostle. One thing however he leaves in uncertainty; whether we are to regard such disciple of St. Paul, or the Apostle himself, as speaking in the first person throughout the Epistle.

20. Secondly, the fact that some churches, or church, regarded the Epistle as the work of St. Paul. But here again the expression is somewhat vague. The words, "if any church," may be an uncertain indication of several churches, or it may be a pointed allusion to one. If the latter, which from what follows, is the more probable, the church would probably be the Alexandrian, by what we have already seen of the testimonies of Pantænus and Clement. The words "let it have credit for the circumstance" must be taken as meaning, "I have no wish to deprive it of this its peculiar advantage;" and the ground, "for not in vain have the ancients handed it down as Paul's," must be his own conviction, that the thoughts of the Epistle proceeded originally from the Apostle. Who "the ancients" were, it is impossible for us to say. Possibly, if we confine our view to one church, no more than Pantænus, and Clement, and their disciples. One thing is very plain; that they cannot have been men whose tradition satisfied Origen himself, or he would not have spoken as he has. Be they who they might, one thing is plain; that their tradition is spoken of by him as not in vain, not as resting on external matter of fact, but as finding justification in the internal character of the Epistle; and that it did not extend to the fact of St. Paul having written the Epistle, but only to its being, in some sense, his.

21. Thirdly, that the authorship of the Epistle was regarded by Origen as utterly unknown. Thus only can we interpret the words, "but who wrote the Epistle, God only knows the truth." For that it is in vain to attempt to understand the word wrote of the mere scribe, in the sense of Rom. xvi. 22, is shewn by its use in the same sentence, "Luke who wrote the Gospel and the Acts."

22. This passage further testifies respecting external tradition, as it had come down to Origen himself. He speaks of "the account which has come down to us:" clearly meaning these words of historical tradition, and thereby by implication excluding from that category the tradition of the Pauline authorship. And this historical tradition gave two views: one, that Clement of Rome was the Writer; the other, that St. Luke was the Writer.

23. And this last circumstance is of importance, as being our only clue out of a difficulty which Bleek has felt, but has not attempted to remove. We find ourselves otherwise in this ambiguity with regard to the origin of one or the other hypothesis. If the Pauline authorship was the original historical tradition, the difficulties presented by the Epistle itself were sure to have called it in doubt, and suggested the other: if on the other hand the name of any disciple of St. Paul was delivered down by historical tradition as the writer, the apostolicity and Pauline character of the thoughts, coupled with the desire to find a great name for an anonymous Epistle, was sure to have produced, and when produced would easily find acceptance for, the idea that St. Paul was the author. But the fact that Origen speaks of "the account which has come down to us," not as for, but as against the Pauline hypothesis, seems to shew that the former of these alternatives was really the case.

24. As far then as we have at present advanced, we seem to have gathered the following as the probable result, as to the practice and state of opinion in the Alexandrine church :

(a) That it was customary to speak of and quote from the Epistle as the work of St. Paul.

(b) That this was done by writers of discernment, and familiarity with the apostolic writings, not because they thought the style and actual writing to be St. Paul's, but as seeing that from the nature of the thoughts and matter, the Epistle was worthy of and characteristic of that Apostle ; thus feeling that it was not without reason that those before them had delivered the Epistle down to them as St. Paul's.

(c) That we nowhere find trace of historical tradition asserting the Pauline authorship : but on the contrary, we find it expressly quoted on the other side <sup>4</sup>.

25. We now pass to other portions of the church : and next, to pro-consular Africa. Here we find, in the beginning of the third century, the testimony of TERTULLIAN, expressly ascribing the Epistle to Barnabas. "There exists also a writing under the name of Barnabas, addressed to the Hebrews : a man of sufficient authority, considering that Paul ranked him with himself in the practice of abstinence (1 Cor. ix. 6)." And then he cites Heb. vi. 4—8, as an admonition of Barnabas.

26. From the way in which the Epistle is here simply cited as the work of Barnabas, we clearly see that this was no mere opinion of Tertullian's own, but at all events the accepted view of that portion of the church. He does not hint at any doubt on the matter. But here again we are at a loss, from what source to derive this view. Either, supposing Barnabas really the author, genuine historical tradition may have been its source,—or lacking such tradition, some in the African church may originally have inferred this from the nature of the contents of the Epistle ; and the view may subsequently have become general there. One thing however the testimony shews beyond all doubt : that the idea of a Pauline authorship was wholly unknown to Tertullian, and to those for whom he wrote.

27. If it were necessary further to confirm evidence so decisive, we might do so by citing his charge against Marcion, of falsifying the number of the Epistles of St. Paul : "Yet I am astonished, seeing that he received Epistles written to individuals, that he has rejected the two to Timothy, and one to Titus, on the state of the church. He has taken upon him, I fancy, also to falsify the number of the Epistles."

Now seeing that Marcion held ten Epistles only of St. Paul, it would appear by combining this with the former testimony, that the Epistle to the Hebrews was not here reckoned among them.

28. Among the witnesses belonging to the end of the second and beginning of the third century, none is of more weight than IRENÆUS, a Greek of Asia Minor by birth, and bishop of Lyons in Gaul, and thus representing the testimony of the church in both countries. In his great work against Heresies, he makes frequent use of the Epistles of St. Paul, expressly quoting twelve of them. There is no citation from the Epistle to Philemon, which may well be, from its brevity, and its personal character. But nowhere in this work has he cited or referred to the Epistle to the Hebrews at all, although it would have been exceedingly apposite for his purpose, as against the Gnostics of his time. Eusebius says "that a work of Irenæus was extant in his time, called treatises concerning various matters, wherein he quoted passages from the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the Wisdom of Solomon." From this it would seem that Eusebius was unable to find any citations of the Epistle in other works of Irenæus known to him. And he does not even here say that Irenæus mentioned St. Paul as the author of the Epistle.

29. Indeed we have a testimony which goes to assert that this Father distinctly denied the Pauline authorship. Photius cites a passage from Stephen Gobar, a tritheist of the sixth century, in which he says, "that Hippolytus and Irenæus assert the Epistle to the Hebrews, commonly ascribed to Paul, not to be by him." The same is indeed asserted of Hippolytus by Photius himself; but it is strange, if Irenæus had asserted it, that Eusebius should have made no mention of the fact, adducing as he does the citation of the Epistle by him. At the same time, Gobar's language is far too precise to be referred to the mere fact that Irenæus does not cite the Epistle as St. Paul's, as some have endeavoured to refer it: and it is to be remembered, that Eusebius does not pretend to have read or seen all the works of Irenæus then extant. Bleek puts the alternative well, according as we accept, or do not accept, the assertion of Gobar. If we accept it, it would shew that Irenæus had found somewhere prevalent the idea that St. Paul was the author; otherwise he would not have taken the pains to contradict such an idea. If we do not accept it as any more than a negative report, meaning that Irenæus nowhere cites the Epistle as St. Paul's, then at all events, considering that he constantly cites St. Paul's Epistles as his, we shall have the presumption, that he neither accepted, nor knew of, any such idea as the Pauline authorship.

30. If we now pass to the Church of Rome, we find, belonging to the period of which we have been treating, the testimony of the presbyter CAIUS. Of him Eusebius relates, "that in a dialogue published by him, he speaks of thirteen Epistles only written by Paul, not numbering among them that to the Hebrews, because it is even till now (Eusebius's time) thought by some at Rome not to be the Apostle's."

These words can lead only to one of two inferences : that Caius, not numbering the Epistle among those of St. Paul, either placed it by itself, or did not mention it at all. In either case, he must be regarded as speaking, not his own private judgment merely, but that of the church to which he belonged, in which, as we further learn, the same judgment yet lingered more than a century after.

31. Another testimony is that of the fragment respecting the canon of the New Test., first published by Muratori, and known by his name, generally ascribed to the end of the second or the beginning of the third century. In this fragment it is stated that St. Paul wrote Epistles to seven churches ; and his thirteen Epistles are enumerated, in a peculiar order : but that to the Hebrews is not named, unless it be distantly hinted at, which is not probable.

32. As far then as we have advanced, the following seems to be our result. Nowhere, except in the Alexandrine church, does there seem to have existed any idea that the Epistle was St. Paul's. Throughout the whole Western Church, it is either left unenumerated among his writings, or expressly excluded from them. That it is wholly futile to attempt to refer this to any influence of the Montanist or Marcionite disputes, has been well and simply shewn by Bleek. The idea of the catholic teachers of the whole Western Church disparaging and excluding an apostolical book, because one passage of it (ch. vi. 4—6) seemed to favour the tenets of their adversaries, is too preposterous ever to have been suggested, except in the interests of a desperate cause : and the fact that Tertullian, himself a Montanist, cites Heb. vi. 4—6 on his side, but without ascribing it to St. Paul, is decisive against the notion that his adversaries so ascribed it at any time : for he would have been sure in that case to have charged them with their desertion of such an opinion.

33. And even in the Alexandrine Church itself, as we have seen, there is no reliable trace of a historical tradition of the Pauline authorship. Every expression which seems to imply this, such e. g. as that much-adduced one of Origen, "for not in vain have the ancients handed it down as being Paul's," when fairly examined, gives way under us. The traditional account, though inconsistent with itself, was entirely the other way.

34. The fair account then of opinion in the latter end of the second century seems to be this : that there was then, as now, great uncertainty regarding the authorship of our Epistle : that the general cast of the thoughts was recognized as Pauline, and that the ancients, whatever that may imply, had not unreasonably handed it down as St. Paul's : but on what grounds, we are totally unable to say : for ecclesiastical tradition does not bear them out. In proconsular Africa it was ascribed to Barnabas : by the tradition which had come down to Origen and his fellows, to Luke or Clement ; while the Western Church, even when judged of by Irenæus, who was brought up in Asia, and even including the Church of Rome, the capital of the world, where all reports on such matters were sure to be ventilated, seems to have been altogether without any positive tradition or opinion on the matter.

35. Before advancing with the history, which has now become of secondary importance to us, I will state to what, in my own view, this result points, as regarding the formation of our own conclusion on the matter.

36. It simply leaves us, unfettered by any overpowering judgment of antiquity, to examine the Epistle for ourselves, and form our own opinion from its contents. Even were we to admit the opinion of a Pauline authorship to the rank of an early tradition, which it does not appear in the strict sense to have been, we should then have ancient ecclesiastical tradition broken into various lines, and inconsistent with itself : not requiring our assent to one or other of its numerous variations. Those who are prepared to follow it, and it alone, will have to make up their minds whether they will attach themselves to the catechetical school of Alexandria, and if so, whether to that portion of it (if such portion existed, which is not proved) which regarded the Epistle as purely and simply the work of St. Paul, or to that which, with Clement, regarded the present Epistle as a Greek version by St. Luke of a Hebrew original by St. Paul,—or to the West African Church, which regarded it as written by Barnabas ; or to the “story” or “account” mentioned by Origen, in its Clementine or its Lucan branch ; or to the negative view of the churches of Europe.

37. For to one or other of these courses, and on these grounds, would the intelligent follower of tradition be confined. It would be in vain for him to allege, as a motive for his opinion, the subsequent universal prevalence of one or other of these views, unless he could at the same time shew that that prevalence was owing to the overpowering force of an authentic tradition, somewhere or other existing. That the whole church of Rome believed the Pauline authorship in subsequent centuries, would be no compensation for the total absence of such belief at that time when, if there were any such authentic tradition any where, it must have prevailed in that church. That the same was uniformly asserted and acted on by the writers of the Alexandrine church in later ages, does not tend to throw any light on the vague uncertainty which hangs over the first appearances of the opinion, wherever it is spoken of and its grounds alleged by such earlier teachers as Clement and Origen.

38. And these considerations are much strengthened, when we take into account what strong reasons there were why the opinion of the Pauline authorship, when once advanced by men of authority in teaching, should gain general acceptance. We see this tendency already prevailing in the writings of Clement of Alexandria and Origen; who, notwithstanding the sentences which have been quoted from them, yet throughout their writings acquiesce for the most part in a conventional habit of citing the Epistle as the work of St. Paul. And as time passed on, a belief, which so conveniently set at rest all doubts about an important anonymous canonical writing, spread (and all the more as the character of the times became less and less critical and enquiring) over the whole extent of the church.

39. It will be well to interpose two cautions, especially for young readers. It has been very much the practice with the maintainers of the Pauline authorship to deal largely in sweeping assertions regarding early ecclesiastical tradition. They have not unfrequently alleged on their side the habit of citation of Clement and Origen, as shewing their belief respecting the Epistle, uncorrected by those passages which shew what that belief really was. Let not readers then be borne away by these strong assertions, but let them carefully and intelligently examine for themselves.

40. Our second caution is one regarding the intelligent use of ancient testimony. Hitherto, we have been endeavouring to trace up to their first origin the beliefs respecting the Epistle. Whence did they first arise? Where do we find them prevailing in the earliest times, and there, why? Now this is the only method of enquiry on the subject which is or can be decisive, as far as external evidence is concerned. In following down the stream of time, materials for this enquiry soon fail us. And it has been the practice of some of the upholders of the Pauline authorship, to amass long lists of names and testimonies, from later ages, of men who simply swelled the ranks of conformity to the opinion when it once became prevalent. Let readers distrust all such accumulations as evidence. They are valuable as shewing the growth and prevalence of the opinion, but in no other light. No accretions to the river in its course can alter the situation and character of the fountain-head.

41. We proceed now with the history of opinion, which, as before remarked, is become very much the history of the spread of the belief of a Pauline authorship.

At Alexandria, as we might have expected, the conventional habit of quoting the Epistle as St. Paul's gradually prevailed over critical suspicion and early tradition.

42. DIONYSIUS, president of the catechetical school, and afterwards bishop of Alexandria, in the middle of the third century, cites Heb. x. 34 expressly as the words of St. Paul. PETER, bishop (about 300), who suffered under Diocletian, cites Heb. xi. 32 as the Apostle's.

HIERAX or Hieracas, of Leontopolis, who lived about the same time, and who, although the founder of a heresy, appears not to have severed himself from the church, is repeatedly adduced by Epiphanius as citing the Epistle as "the Apostle's:" and the same Epiphanius says of the Melchisedekites (see on ch. vii. 3), that they attempted to support their view by Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews.

ALEXANDER, bishop about 312, says in an Epistle to Alexander bishop of Constantinople,

"Agreeably to this exclaims also the lofty speaker Paul, saying concerning Him, 'Whom He appointed heir of all things, by whom also He made the worlds:'" Heb. i. 2.

ANTONIUS, the celebrated promoter of the monastic life in Egypt, in one of his seven epistles to various monasteries, says, "of whom Paul saith that they, on account of us, have not received the promises" (Heb. xi. 13, 39, 40).

43. But the most weighty witness for the view of the Alexandrine church at this time is ATHANASIUS, in the middle of the fourth century. He enumerates the canonical books which have come down and are believed to be inspired, among which he names fourteen Epistles of St. Paul, and among them our Epistle, without alluding to any doubt on the subject. And in his other writings every where he cites the Epistle as St. Paul's.

44. Belonging to nearly the same time in the same church are three other writers—by all of whom the Epistle is either expressly or implicitly cited as the work of St. Paul.

45. It would be to little purpose to multiply names, in a church which by this time had universally and undoubtably received the Pauline authorship. Bleek has adduced, with copious citations, DIDYMUS (the teacher of Jerome and Rufinus),—MARCUS EREMITA (about 400),—THEOPHILUS of ALEXANDRIA (about 400),—ISIDORE of PELUSIUM (died 450),—CYRIL of ALEXANDRIA (died 444): concerning which last it is to be observed, that though Nestorius had adduced passages from the Epistle on his side, as being St. Paul's, Cyril, in refuting them, does not make the slightest reference to the formerly existing doubt as to the authorship.

46. And so it continued in this church in subsequent times: the only remarkable exception being found in EUTHALIUS (about 460), who, though he regards the Epistle as of Pauline origin, and reckons fourteen Epistles of St. Paul, yet adduces the old doubts concerning it, and believes it to be a translation made by Clement of Rome from a Hebrew original by the Apostle. This view he supports by the considerations, 1. of its style; 2. of its wanting an address from the writer; 3. on account of what is said ch. ii. 3, 4. For the first, he gives the reason that it was translated from the Hebrew, some say, by Luke, but most, by Clement, whose style it resembles. Then he gives the usual reason for the want of a superscription, viz. that St. Paul was not the Apostle of the Jews but of the Gentiles, citing Gal. ii. 9, 10: and proceeds, but the Epistle is afterwards seen to be Paul's, by ch. x. 34, in which the (now exploded) reading with my bonds is his point: by ch. xiii. 18, 19: by ch. xiii. 23, in which he interprets the word which we render, "set at liberty," "sent forth for the ministry," which he says no one could do but St. Paul: and then expecting him soon, he promises, as is his custom frequently, a visit from himself with him.

This testimony is valuable, as shewing that in the midst of the prevalence of the now accepted opinion, a spirit of intelligent criticism still survived.

47. If we now turn to other parts of the Eastern Church, we find the same acceptation of the Pauline authorship from the middle of the third century onwards. Bleek gives citations from METHODIUS, Bishop of Olympus in Lycia, about 290: from PAUL of SAMOSATA, Bishop of Antioch in 264: from JACOB, Bishop of NISIBIS, about 325: from EPIREM the SYRIAN (died 378).

48. A separate notice is required of the testimony of EUSEBIUS of Caesarea, the well-known Church historian. In very many passages throughout his works, and more especially in his commentary on the Psalms, he cites the Epistle, and always as the work of St. Paul, or of "the Apostle," or "the holy Apostle," or "the divine Apostle." In his Ecclesiastical History also he reckons it among the Epistles of St. Paul. In the chapter which treats especially of the canon of the New Test., while there is no express mention of the Epistle to the Hebrews, it is evident, by comparing his words there and in another place, that he reckons it as confessedly one of the writings of St. Paul. For he enumerates among those New Test. books which are 'received by all,' fourteen Epistles of St. Paul.

Still it would appear from another passage, that Eusebius himself believed the Epistle to have been written in Hebrew by St. Paul and translated by Luke, or more probably by Clement, whose style it resembles.

If such was his view, however, he was hardly consistent with himself: for elsewhere he seems to assume that the Epistle was written in Greek by the Apostle himself; an inconsistency which betrays either carelessness, or change of opinion.

49. Marks of the same inconsistency further appear in another place, where he numbers our Epistle among the doubtful books, saying of Clement of Alexandria, that he cites testimonies from doubtful books, such as that called the Wisdom of Solomon, Jesus the Son of Sirach, and the Epistle to the Hebrews, and those of Barnabas and Clement and Jude. It has been suggested that the inconsistency may be removed by accepting this last as a mere matter of fact, meaning that these books are called in question by some.

50. As we pass downwards, I shall mention but cursorily those writers who uniformly quote the Epistle as St. Paul's; pausing only to notice any trace of a different opinion, or any testimony worth express citation. The full testimonies will be found in Bleek, and most of them in Lardner, vol. ii.

51. Of the class first mentioned in the foregoing paragraph, are Cyril of Jerusalem (died 386); Gregory of Nazianzum (died 389); Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis in Cyprus (died 402); Basil the Great, Bishop of Casarea in Cappadocia (died 379); his brother Gregory, Bishop of Nyssa (died about 370); Titus of Bostra (died about 371); Chrysostom (died 407); Theodore of Mopsuestia (died about 428); Theodoret, Bishop of Cyrus in Cilicia (died 457).

52. In the works of this latter Father we find it asserted that the Epistle was written from Rome. Also we find the Arians charged with setting it aside as spurious.

The same accusation is found,—in the Dialogue on the Trinity, ascribed sometimes to Athanasius, sometimes to Theodoret: where the orthodox interlocutor makes the rather startling assertion, “that ever since the Gospel was first preached, the Epistle had been believed to be Paul's;”—and in Epiphanius, Hær. lxi. 14, p. 738, where at the same time he charges them with misusing Heb. iii. 2, Him that made Him, for the purposes of their error. From this, and from the Epistle of Arius to Alexander, where he professes his faith, and cites Heb. i. 2, it is plain that the Arians did not reject the Epistle altogether. Nay, they hardly denied its Pauline authenticity; for in that case we should have Athanasius in his polemics against them, and Alexander, defending this authenticity, whereas they always take it for granted. Moreover in the disputation of Augustine with the Arian Gothic Bishop Maximinus, we find the latter twice quoting the Epistle as St. Paul's. So that whatever may have been done by individual Arians, it is clear that as a party they did not reject either the Epistle itself or its Pauline authorship.

53. Correspondent with the spread of the acceptance of the Epistle as St. Paul's was its reception, in the MSS., into the number of his Epistles. It was so received in the character of a recent accession, variously ranked: either at the end of those addressed to churches, or at the end of all.

54. The motives for these differing arrangements were obvious. Some placed it last, as an addition to the Epistles of St. Paul; others, to give it more its proper rank, put it before the Epistles to individuals. But had it been originally among St. Paul's Epistles, there can be no doubt that it would have taken its place according to its importance, which is the principle of arrangement of the undoubted Pauline Epistles in the canon.

55. A trace of a peculiar arrangement is found in the Great Vatican

Manuscript. In that MS., all the fourteen Epistles of St. Paul form one continued whole, numbered throughout by sections. But the Epistle to the Hebrews, which stands after 2 Thess., does not correspond, in the numeration of its sections, with its present place in the order. It evidently once followed the Epistle to the Galatians, that Epistle ending with the 59th section,—Heb. beginning with § 60,—and Eph. (the latter part of Heb. being deficient) with § 70. This would seem to shew that the MS. from which this was copied, or at all events which was at some previous time copied for its text, had Heb. after Gal.; which would indicate a still stronger persuasion that it was St. Paul's. In the Sahidic version only does it appear in that place which it would naturally hold according to its importance: i. e. between 2 Cor. and Gal. But from the fact of no existing Greek MS. having it in this place, we must ascribe the phenomenon to the caprice of the framer of that version.

56. Returning to the Western church, we find that it was some time after the beginning of the third century before the Epistle was generally recognized as St. Paul's; and that even when this became the case, it was not equally used and cited with the rest of his Epistles.

About the middle of the third century flourished in the church of Rome NOVATIAN, the author of the celebrated schism which went by his name. We have works of his full of Scripture citations, and on subjects which would have been admirably elucidated by this Epistle. Yet nowhere has he quoted or alluded to it. That he would not have had any feeling adverse to it is pretty clear; for no passage in the New Test. could give such apparent countenance to his severer view concerning the non-readmission of the "lapsed," as Heb. vi. 4—6. Yet he never cited it for his purpose.

57. Contemporary with Novatian, we have, in the West African church, CYPRIAN, Bishop of Carthage (died 258). In all his writings, he never cites, or even alludes to, our Epistle; which he would certainly have done for the same reason as Novatian would have done it, had he recognized it as the work of St. Paul; the whole of whose Epistles he cites, with the exception of that to Philemon. In all probability, Tertullian's view was also his, that it was written by Barnabas.

58. A little later we have a witness from another part of the Latin church; VICTORINUS, Bishop of Pettau on the Drave, in Pannonia (died about 303). He asserts, in the most explicit manner, that St. Paul wrote only to seven churches; and he enumerates the churches: viz. the Roman, Corinthian, Galatian, Ephesian, Philippian, Colossian, Thessalonian.

We may add to this, that the Epistle to the Hebrews is never quoted in his Commentary on the Apocalypse.

59. About the middle of the fourth century, we find the practice beginning in the Latin church, of quoting the Epistle as St. Paul's : but at first only here and there, and not as if the opinion were the prevailing one. Bleek traces the adoption of this view by the Latins to their closer intercourse with the Greeks about this time owing to the Arian controversy, which occasioned several of the Western theologians to spend some time in the East, where the Epistle was cited, at first by both parties, and always by the Catholics, as undoubtedly St. Paul's. Add to this the study of the Greek expository writers, and especially of Origen, and we shall have adduced enough reasons to account for the gradual spread of the idea of the Pauline authorship over the West.

60. A fitting example of both these influences is found in HILARY, Bp. of Poitiers (died 368), who seems to have been the first who thus regarded the Epistle. He quotes it indeed but seldom, in comparison with other parts of Scripture, and especially with St. Paul's Epistles ; but when he does, it is decisively and without doubt, as the work of the Apostle.

61. LUCIFER of Cagliari (died 371) also cites the Epistle as St. Paul's, but once only, though he frequently cites Scripture, and especially St. Paul's Epistles. And it is observable of him, that he was exiled by the emperor Constantius, and spent some time in Palestine and the Thebaid.

62. Fabius Marius VICTORINUS belongs to these same times. He was born in Africa, and passed the greater part of his days as a rhetorician at Rome : being baptized as a Christian late in life. Most of his remaining works are against the Arians : and in them he cites our Epistle two or three times, and as St. Paul's ; still, it has been observed (by Bleek), not with such emphasis as the other books of Scripture, but more as a mere passing reference. He is said by Jerome to have written Commentaries on the Apostle, i. e. on the Pauline Epistles : yet it would appear, from what Cassiodorus implies in the sixth century, that up to his time no Latin writer had commented on the Epistle, that he did not include it among them.

63. Other Latin writers there are of this time, who make no use of our Epistle, though it would have well served their purpose in their writings. Such are,—PHÆBADIUS, Bp. of Agen, in S. W. Gaul (died aft. 392) ;—ZENO, Bp. of Verona (about 360) ;—PACIANUS, Bp. of Barcelona (about 370) ;—HILARY the Deacon, generally supposed to be the author of the Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles found among the works of Ambrose (about 370) <sup>6</sup> ;—OPTATUS, Bp. of Milevi (about 364—375), who wrote on the Donatist schism. All these quote frequently from other parts of the New Test. and from St. Paul's Epistles.

64. On the other hand, AMBROSE, Bp. of Milan (died 397), combating strongly the Arians of his time, and making diligent use of the writings of Origen, Didymus, and Basil, often uses and quotes the Epistle, and always as the work of St. Paul. In one celebrated passage in his treatise on Penitence, where he is impugning the allegation by the Novatians of Heb. vi. 4 ff., he defends the passage from misunderstanding; confesses its apparent inconsistency with St. Paul's conduct to the sinner at Corinth; does not think of questioning the apostolical authority of the passage, but asks, "Could Paul preach against his own act?" and gives two solutions of the apparent discrepancy.

65. We have an important testimony concerning our Epistle from PHILAstrius, Bp. of Brescia (died about 387), who while he cites the Epistle as unhesitatingly as his friend Ambrose, in his treatise on Heresies, says, "There is a heresy of some respecting the Epistle of Paul to the Hebrews. There are some who assert it not to be his, but say that it was written either by Barnabas the Apostle, or by Clement, Bishop of Rome. And others say it is an Epistle of the Evangelist Luke to the Laodiceans<sup>6</sup>. And because some unbelievers have made additions in it, it is not read in the church; and, if it is read by some, yet it is not read to the people in the church, but only thirteen Epistles of his, and occasionally that to the Hebrews. Also, because it is written in plausible language after a fashion, they think it not to be the work of that Apostle. Also because in it the author says that Christ was made (ch. iii. 2), it is not read. And equally for another reason, its saying about penitence (ch. vi. 4 ff.), on account of the Novatians." Then he proceeds to give orthodox explanations of both places.

He has also another remarkable passage, in which he enumerates thirteen Epistles of Paul as canonical, and calls the rest apocryphal, to be read for moral instruction by the perfect, but not by all, as having been tampered with (so he would seem to mean) by heretics.

These testimonies of Philastrius are curious, and hardly consistent with one another, nor with his own usual practice of citing the Epistle as St. Paul's. They seem to lead us to an inference agreeing with that to which our previous enquiries led, viz. that though some controversial writers in the Latin church at the end of the fourth century were beginning to cite the Epistle as St. Paul's, it was not at that time so recognized in that church generally, nor publicly read; or if read, but seldom.

<sup>6</sup> This curious sentence can hardly mean, as Bleek, that they believed the Epistle to the Hebrews to be St. Luke's, as also that apocryphal one which is written to the Laodiceans; but that they believed the Epistle to the Hebrews to be St. Luke's, and that it was also written to the Laodiceans, i.e. was the Epistle alluded to under that designation by St. Paul in Col. iv. 16. What follows is very obscure, but does not seem to me to support this rendering of Bleek's.

66. This reluctance on the part of the Latin church to receive and recognize the Epistle was doubtless continued and increased by the use made of some passages in it by the Novatian schismatics. We have seen already, in par. 64, that Ambrose adduces this fact : and Bleek brings several instances of it from other writers. But as time advanced, the intrinsic value of the Epistle itself, and the example of writers of the Greek church, gained for it almost universal reception, and reputation of Pauline authorship in the West. Thus GAUDENTIUS, successor of Philastrius in the see of Breſcia in 387, to which he was summoned from travelling in Cappadocia,—and FAUSTINUS, who followed in this, as in other things, the practice of Lucifer of Cagliari,—cite the Epistle without hesitation as St. Paul's. So in general does RUFINUS (died about 411), having spent a long time in Egypt, and being familiar with the writings of Origen. He gives “fourteen Epistles of the Apostle Paul” among the writings “which the fathers had included in the canon :” and in his writings generally cites the Epistle as Pauline without hesitation.

67. I shall close this historical sketch with a fuller notice of the important testimonies of JEROME and AUGUSTINE, and a brief summary of those who followed them.

68. JEROME (died 420) spent a great portion of his life in Egypt, Palestine, and other parts of the East ; was well acquainted with the writings of Origen ; and personally knew such men as Gregory of Nazianzum, Didymus, Epiphanius, and the other Greek theologians of his time. It might therefore have been expected, that he would, as we have seen other Latin writers do, have adopted the Greek practice, and have unhesitatingly cited and spoken of this Epistle as the work of St. Paul. This however is by no means the case. On the whole, his usual practice is, to cite the words of the Epistle, and ascribe them to St. Paul : and in his work on Hebrew names, where he interprets the Hebrew words which occur in Scripture, in the order of the books where they are found, he introduces the Epistle as St. Paul's, after 2 Thessalonians.

69. But the exceptions to this practice of unhesitating citation are many and important : and wherever he gives any account of the Epistle, he is far from concealing the doubts which prevailed respecting it. I shall give some of the most remarkable passages.

In the Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers, chap. 5, under Paul, he says :

“He wrote nine Epistles, to seven churches ; one to the Romans, two to the Corinthians, one to the Galatians, one to the Ephesians, one to the Philippians, one to the Colossians, two to the Thessalonians ; and besides, to his disciples, two to Timothy, one to Titus, one to Philemon. But the Epistle addressed to the Hebrews is not believed to be his, on account of the difference of style and diction, but is thought to be either Barnabas's, according to Tertullian, or Luke the Evangelist's, according to some, or Clement's, afterwards bishop of the Roman church, who is reported to have arranged and adorned Paul's thoughts in words of his own; or at any rate that Paul, in writing to the Hebrews, on account of his unpopularity among them, suppressed the mention of his name in the opening salutation. For he had written as a Hebrew to the Hebrews in Hebrew, i. e. in his own mother tongue, most eloquently, and those things which were written eloquently in Hebrew were still more eloquently turned into Greek: and this is the cause why it seems to differ from the rest of Paul's Epistles."

70. In this passage, while he relates the doubts and hypotheses, his own leaning seems to be, to believe that the fact of St. Paul having written in Hebrew, and having omitted a salutation owing to his unpopularity among the Jews, would be enough to account for the phenomena of the Epistle.

71. But in other places, he gives other reasons for the difficulties of the Epistle and for the doubts respecting it. Thus in his Commentary on Gal. i. 1 he says, that St. Paul does not in it call himself an Apostle, or mention his name, because it would be incongruous, where Christ was going to be called an Apostle (Heb. iii. 1, iv. 14), that Paul should have the same appellation.

Again, on Isa. vi. 9, 10, he says that the Epistle is questioned, because in it Paul, writing to Hebrews, uses testimonies which are not in the Hebrew books.

72. In the prologue to his Commentary on Titus, he severely blames the Marcionites and other heretics for excluding arbitrarily certain Epistles from the number of the Apostolic writings, instancing the Pastoral Epistles and this to the Hebrews. He then proceeds:

"If they gave any reason why they think them not the Apostle's, we might try to make some answer satisfactory to the reader. But since now they pronounce with heretical authority, and say that Epistle is Paul's, this is not, let them take the same kind of authority as their refutation on behalf of the truth, by which they are not ashamed to invent falsehoods."

Still that this strong language does not prove him to have been satisfied as to the Pauline authorship, is shewn by two passages in his commentary on this same Epistle to Titus:

"Pay also particular attention to this, how speaking of the presbyters of one city, he afterwards calls them bishops. If any likes to acknowledge that Epistle which under the name of Paul is written to the Hebrews, there also the care of the church is divided among many. For he writes to the people, ‘Obey your chief men,’ &c. (Heb. xiii. 17).”

And,

“Read again the Epistle to the Hebrews by Paul, or by whomsoever else you think it written; go through that whole catalogue of faith, in which it is written, ‘By faith Abel offered to God a greater sacrifice than Cain,’ &c. (Heb. xi. 4—8).”

And again in his Commentary on Ezek. xxviii.,

“And Paul the Apostle says (if one is to receive the Epistle to the Hebrews), ‘Ye are come near to Mount Sion,’ &c. (Heb. xii. 22).”

In another place, he speaks in almost the same words.

73. The following expressions regarding the Epistle, testifying to the same doubt, occur in his writings:

“The Epistle to the Hebrews, which all the Greeks receive, and some of the Latins.”

“Paul in his Epistle to the Hebrews, though many of the Latins are doubtful about it.” . . . . . “But among the Romans to this day it is not accounted the work of Paul the Apostle:”—“which the Latin usage receives not:”—“although the Latin usage does not receive it among the canonical Scriptures,” &c.

74. A passage requiring more express notice is found in his Epistle to Dardanus, where after citing testimonies from Heb. xi. xii., he proceeds:

“Nor does it escape me that the bad faith of the Jews does not receive these testimonies, confirmed as they are by the authority of the Old Testament. This reply we leave to our own people, that this Epistle, which is inscribed to the Hebrews, is received as the Apostle Paul’s, not only by the churches of the East, but by all the old ecclesiastical Greek writers,—although most of them think it to be Barnabas’s, or Clement’s: and that it is of no import whose it is, since it is acknowledged to be the writing of an orthodox (literally, ecclesiastical) author, and is daily read in the churches. And if the Latin use does not receive it among the canonical Scriptures, so neither do the Greek churches, using the same liberty of judgment, receive the Apocalypse of St. John: and yet we receive both, in no way following the custom of this time, but the authority of ancient writers, who constantly cite testimonies from both of these books, not as they sometimes do from apocryphal writings (and, but rarely, from Pagan authors also), but as canonical.”

75. There are some points in this important testimony, which seem to want elucidation. Jerome asserts, for example, that by all preceding Greek writers the Epistle had been received as St. Paul's : and yet immediately after, he says that most of them think it to be Barnabas's or Clement's<sup>7</sup> : and think it to be of no consequence (whose it is), seeing that it is the production of an "ecclesiastical author," and is every day read in the churches. Now though these expressions are not very perspicuous, it is not difficult to see what is meant by them. A general conventional reception of the Epistle as St. Paul's prevailed among the Greeks. To this their writers (without exception according to Jerome : but that is a loose assertion, as the preceding pages will shew) conformed, still in most cases entertaining their own views as to Barnabas or Clement having written the Epistle, and thinking it of little moment, seeing that confessedly it was the work of an "ecclesiastical author," and was stamped with the authority of public reading in the churches. The expression "ecclesiastical author" seems to be in contrast to an heretical one.

76. The evidence here however on one point is clear enough : and shews that in Jerome's day, i.e. in the beginning of the fifth century, the custom of the Latins did not receive the Epistle to the Hebrews among the canonical Scriptures.

77. Jerome's own view, as far as it can be gathered from this passage, is, that while he wishes to look on the Epistle as decidedly canonical, he does not venture to say who the author was, and believes the question to be immaterial : for we cannot but suppose him, from the very form of the clause "and that it is of no import &c.," to be giving to this view his own approbation.

78. And consistent with this are many citations of the Epistle scattered up and down among his works : as, e.g., where he speaks of "whoever wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews :"—of "Paul, or some one else who wrote the Epistle ;" and adduces the fact of Paul having written to seven churches, "the eighth, to the Hebrews, being by most excluded from the number."

79. And as Bleek has very satisfactorily shewn, no difference in time can be established between these testimonies of his, which should prove that he once doubted the Pauline authorship and was afterwards convinced, or vice versâ. For passages inconsistent with one another occur in one and the same work, e.g., in the Commentary on Isaiah, in which, notwithstanding that he speaks uncertainly as above, yet he repeatedly cites the Epistle as the work of St. Paul. And these Commentaries on the prophets were among his later works.

<sup>7</sup> By no possible ingenuity can these words be made to mean, as Dr. Davidson interprets them, that "the Greeks ascribed the style and language of it to Barnabas or Clement, though the ideas and sentiments were Paul's."

80. We may safely then gather from that which has been said, what Jerome's view on the whole really was. He commonly, and when not speaking with deliberation, followed the usual practice of citing the Epistle as St. Paul's. But he very frequently guards himself by an expression of uncertainty: and sometimes distinctly states the doubt which prevailed on the subject. That his own mind was not clear on it, is plain from many of the above-cited passages. In fact, though quoted on the side of the Pauline authorship, the testimony of Jerome is quite as much against as in favour of it. Even in his time, after so long a prevalence of the conventional habit of quoting it as St. Paul's, he feels himself constrained, in a great proportion of the cases where he cites it, to cast doubt on the opinion, that it was written by the Apostle.

81. The testimony of AUGUSTINE (died 430) is, on the whole, of the same kind. It was his lot to take part in several synods in which the canon of the New Test. came into question. And it is observable, that while in two of these, one held at Hippo in 393, when he was yet a presbyter, the other the 3rd council of Carthage in 398, we read of "thirteen Epistles of the Apostle Paul: and one of the same to the Hebrews"—clearly shewing that it was not without some difficulty that the Epistle gained a place among the writings of the Apostle,—in the 5th council of Carthage, held in 419, where Augustine also took a part, we read "Epistles of Paul the Apostle, in number 14." So that during this interval of 25 years, men had become more accustomed to hear of the Epistle as St. Paul's, and at last admitted it into the number of his writings without any distinction.

82. We might hence have supposed that Augustine, who was not only present at these councils, but took a leading part in framing their canons, would be found citing the Epistle every where without doubt as St. Paul's. But this is by no means the case. Bleek has diligently collected many passages in which the unsettled state of his own opinion on the question appears. In one remarkable passage, where he enjoins his reader, in judging of canonical writings, to put those first which are received by all Catholic churches, and among those which are not received by all, to prefer those which the principal churches, and those having the highest authority receive, to the others; and having said this, he proceeds to enumerate the canonical books of the Old and New Test., saying how the whole canon of Scripture to which the foregoing consideration applies, is the following, &c.: giving fourteen Epistles of St. Paul, among which he places the Epistle to the Hebrews last: which, as we have seen, was not its usual place at that time.

83. Plainer testimonies of the same uncertainty are found in other parts of his writings: e. g., "The Epistle to the Hebrews also, although in the opinion of some it is of doubtful authority, yet as I have read that some . . . wish to adduce it to support their opinions, and I bow to the authority of the Eastern churches which hold it to be canonical,—let us see how strong testimonies for our view it contains.”

In the beginning of his Exposition of the Epistle to the Romans (written in A.D. 394), he says : “ Except the Epistle which he wrote to the Hebrews, where he is said purposely to have omitted a salutation at the beginning, lest the Jews who never ceased to cry out against him should, by the mention of his name, be offended, or read with a prejudiced mind, or should not care to read at all what he had written for their good. Whence some have been afraid to receive that Epistle into the canon of Scripture. But however that question is to be answered, except this Epistle, all those which are received without doubt by all the churches as St. Paul’s, contain such a salutation,” &c.

In his treatise on the City of God : “ in the Epistle which is inscribed to the Hebrews, which most say is the Apostle Paul’s, but some deny it.”

In that on Faith, Hope, and Charity (A.D. 421) : “ in the Epistle to the Hebrews, which illustrious defenders of the Catholic faith have used as testimony.”

84. Sometimes indeed he cites our Epistle simply with the formulæ,—“ you hear the Apostle’s exhortation :”—“ listen to what the Apostle says :”—sometimes with such words as these, “ whom the Scripture blames, saying ;” “ lastly, on account of what is said.” But much more frequently he cites either merely “ the Epistle to the Hebrews :” or “ the Epistle which is written (or, ‘ which is,’ or, ‘ which is inscribed’) to the Hebrews.” It is certainly a legitimate inference from these modes of quotation, that they arose from a feeling of uncertainty as to the authorship. It would be inconceivable, as Bleek remarks, that Augustine should have used the words “ in the Epistle which is inscribed to the Romans, to the Galatians,” &c.

85. It is of some interest to trace the change of view in the Romish church, which seems to have taken place about this time. In the synod of Hippo, before referred to (par. 81), and in the 3rd council of Carthage (ib.) it was determined to consult “ the church over the sea” for confirmation of the canon of Scripture as then settled. And what was meant by this, is more fully explained by a similar resolution of the 5th council of Carthage (ib.) : viz., that St. Boniface, then Bishop of Rome, and other bishops of those parts were to be consulted. Whether these references were ever made, we have no means of knowing; but we possess a document of the same age, which seems to shew that, had they been made, they would have resulted in the confirmation of the canonical place of the Epistle. Pope Innocent I. in his letter to Exsuperius, Bishop of Toulouse (A.D. 405 ff.), enumerates the books of the New Test.

thus, "Four books of Gospels, fourteen Epistles of the Apostle Paul three Epistles of John," &c.

86. Yet it seems not to have been the practice of the writers of the Roman church at this time to cite the Epistle frequently or authoritatively. That there are no references to it in Innocent's own writings, and in those of his successors Zosimus (417—419) and Bonifacius (419—422), may be accidental: but it can hardly be so, that we have none in those of his predecessor Siricius, who often quotes Scripture: in those of Cælestine I. (422—432), some of whose Epistles are regarding the Nestorian controversy: in the genuine writings of Leo the Great (440—461).

87. Bleek adduces several contemporary Latin writers in other parts of the world, who make no mention of nor citation from our Epistle. Such are Orosius (about 415), Marius Mercator, Evagrius (about 430), Sedulius. Paulinus of Nola (died 431) cites it once, and as St. Paul's. After the middle of the fifth century, the practice became more usual and familiar. We find it in Salvianus (died aft. 495), Vigilius of Tapsus (about 484), Victor of Vite, Fulgentius of Ruspe (died 533), his scholar Fulgentius Ferrandus (died 550), Facundus of Hermiane (about 548), &c.: and in the list of canonical books drawn up in 494 by a council of seventy bishops under Pope Gelasius, where we have "Epistles of the Apostle Paul, fourteen in number;—one to the Romans, &c. &c. . . one to Philemon, one to the Hebrews."

88. In the middle of the sixth century we find Pope Vigilius, who took a conspicuous part in the controversy on the three chapters, in his answer to Theodore of Mopsuestia, impugning the reading "without God" instead of "by the grace of God," Heb. ii. 9 (see on this passage in the Commentary), without in any way calling in question the authority or authenticity of the Epistle.

89. To the same time (about 556) belongs a work of Cassiodorus, who, while he speaks of various Latin commentaries on the Pauline and Catholic Epistles, knew apparently of none on that to the Hebrews, and consequently got Mutianus to make the Latin version of Chrysostom's homilies on it, "lest the continuous order of the Epistles should suddenly be broken by an unfitting termination."

90. Gregory the Great (590—605) treats our Epistle simply as St. Paul's, and lays a stress on the circumstance that the Apostle wrote fourteen canonical Epistles only, though fifteen were reputed his: the fifteenth being the Epistle to the Laodiceans.

91. The testimonies of Isidore of Hispala (Seville: died 636) are remarkable. Citing the Epistle usually without further remark as St. Paul's, and stating the number of his Epistles as fourteen, he yet makes the number of churches to which the Apostle wrote, seven, and enumerates them, including the Hebrews, not observing that he thus makes them eight.

In two other places, in enumerating the writings of St. Paul, he says, "Paul the Apostle wrote his fourteen Epistles, nine of which he addressed to seven churches, and the rest to his disciples Timotheus, Titus, and Philemon. But his Epistle to the Hebrews is considered doubtful by most of the Latins on account of the dissonance of style, and some suspect that Barnabas compiled it, some that it was written by Clement."

92. After this time the assertors of an independent opinion, or even reporters of the former view of the Latin church, are no longer found, being overborne by the now prevalent view of the Pauline authorship. Thomas Aquinas indeed (died 1274) mentions the former doubts, with a view to answer them: and gives reasons for no superscription or address appearing in the Epistle.

And thus matters remained in the church of Rome until the beginning of the sixteenth century: the view of the Pauline authorship universally obtaining: and indeed all enquiry into the criticism of the Scriptures being lulled to rest.

93. But before we enter on the remaining portion of our historical enquiry, it will be well to gather the evidence furnished by the Greek and Latin MSS., as we have above (par. 53) that by the Greek MSS.

The Claromontane MS. (Cent. VI.) contains indeed the Epistle, but in a later hand: and after the Epistle to Philemon we have an enumeration of the lines in the Old and New Test., which does not contain the Epistle to the Hebrews: thus shewing, whatever account is to be given of it, that the Epistle did not originally form part of the MS.

The Boernerian MS. (Cent. IX.) does not contain our Epistle.

The Augiensian MS. (Cent. IX.) does not contain the Epistle in Greek, but in Latin only.

These evidences are the more remarkable, as they all belong to a period when the Pauline authorship had long become the generally received opinion in the Latin church.

94. We now pass on at once to the opening of the sixteenth century: at which time of the revival of independent thought, not only among those who became connected with the Reformation, but also among Roman Catholic writers themselves, we find the ancient doubts concerning the Pauline authorship revived, and new life and reality infused into them.

95. Bleek mentions first among these LUDOVICUS VIVES, the Spanish theologian, who in his Commentary on Augustine, on the words "in the Epistle which is inscribed to the Hebrews," says, "he signifies, that the author is uncertain:" and on the words, "in the Epistle which is inscribed to the Hebrews which most say is the Apostle's, but some deny it," says, "Jerome, Origen, Augustine, and other of the ancients doubt about this; before the age of Jerome, this Epistle was not received by the Latins among the canonical ones."

96. A more remarkable testimony is that of CARDINAL CAJETAN, as cited by Erasmus, who says that the Cardinal, both in conversation when alive and in a work of his, cited the Epistle without its writer's name, designating him as "the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews." Bellarmine cites Cajetan as objecting to the idea that St. Paul wrote the Epistle, ch. ix. 4, as inconsistent with 1 Kings viii. 9, and saying, "Therefore either Paul lies, or he did not write this Epistle."

97. ERASMUS gives it as his decided opinion that the Epistle is not written by St. Paul: and alleges at length the principal arguments on which it is founded. The passage is a long one, but important, and will be found quoted entire in the corresponding paragraph of the Prolegomena to my Greek Testament: and other passages to the same effect are cited in Bleek.

98. LUTHER spoke still more plainly. In his introduction to his version of the Epistle, he maintains that it cannot be St. Paul's, nor indeed the writing of any apostle: appealing to such passages as ch. ii. 3; vi. 4 ff.; x. 26 ff.; xii. 17. But whose it is he does not pretend to say, further than that it comes from some scholar of the Apostles, well versed in the Scriptures. And with this view his manner of citation is generally consistent. His well-known conjecture, that the Writer of the Epistle was Apollos, is expressed in his Commentary on Genesis.

99. In one place he seems to imply that others had already conjectured Apollos to be the author. But this does not appear to be so; and he may, as Bleek imagines, be merely referring to opinions of learned men of his own day, who had either suggested, or adopted his own view.

100. CALVIN's opinion was equally unfavourable to the Pauline authorship. While in his Institutes he ordinarily cites the Epistle as the words of "the Apostle," and defends its apostolicity in the argument to his Commentary, yet he sometimes cites the "author of the Epistle to the Hebrews;" and when he comes to the question itself, declares his view very plainly:

"Who composed it, is hardly worth caring about. Some have thought him to be Paul, some Luke, Barnabas, or Clement. I know that in the time of Chrysostom, it was very generally received by the Greeks among St. Paul's; but the Latins thought otherwise, especially those who were nearest to the times of the Apostles. Nothing will induce me to acknowledge St. Paul as its author. For those who say that his name was purposely suppressed because it was odious to the Jews, allege nothing to the point. For if it were so, why should he have made mention of Timothy? By this indication he betrayed himself. But the manner of teaching and style betoken another than Paul : and the writer confesses himself to have been one of the disciples of the Apostles, ch. ii., which is repugnant in the last degree to the habit of Paul."

And he speaks similarly in his Commentary on ch. ii. 3 itself.

101. Very similar are the comments of BEZA, at least in his earlier editions : for all the passages quoted by Bleek, from his introduction, on ch. ii. 3, xiii. 26, as being in his own edition of Beza 1582, and from Spanheim, as not extant in that edition, are, in the edition of 1590, which I use, expunged, and other comments, favourable to the Pauline origin, substituted for them.

102. And this change of opinion in Beza only coincided with influences which both in the Romish and in the Protestant churches soon repressed the progress of intelligent criticism and free expression of opinion. Cardinal Cajetan was severely handled by Ambrosius Catharinus, who accused him of the same doubts in relation to this Epistle as those entertained by Julian respecting the Gospel of St. Matthew : Erasmus was attacked by the theologians of the Sorbonne in a censure which concludes thus : "Wonderful is the arrogance and the pertinacity of this writer, in that, when so many Catholic doctors, pontiffs, and councils declare that this Epistle is Paul's, and the universal use and consent of the Church approves the same, this writer still doubts it, as being wiser than the whole world." And finally the council of Trent, in 1546, closed up the question for Romanists by declaring, "Of the New Testament, . . . fourteen Epistles of Paul the Apostle : to the Romans, &c. . . . to the Hebrews." So that the best divines of that Church have since then had only that way open to them of expressing an intelligent judgment, which holds the matter of the Epistle to be St. Paul's, but the style and arrangement that of some other person : so Bellarmine : so Estius, in his introduction to the Epistle, which is well worth reading, as a remarkable instance of his ability and candour.

103. In the Protestant churches we find, as might be expected, a longer prevalence of free judgment on the matter. It will be seen by the copious citations in Bleek, that Melancthon remained ever consistent in quoting the Epistle simply as "the Epistle to the Hebrews : " that the Magdeburg Centuriators distinctly denied the Pauline origin : that Brenz, in the Wirtemberg Confession, distinguishes in his citations this Epistle from those of St. Paul.

104. At the same time we find inconsistency on the point in Brenz himself : in the Commentary on the Epistle written by his son, the Pauline authorship is maintained : also by Flacius Illyricus (1557) on à priori grounds. In the Concordien-Formel, the Epistle is cited in the original German without any name, whereas in the Latin version we have "the Apostle saith," and the like. And this latter view continued to gain ground. It is maintained by Gerhard (1641) and Calovius (1676): and since the middle of the seventeenth century has been the prevailing view in the Lutheran Church.

105. In the Calvinistic or Reformed Church, the same view became prevalent even earlier. Of its various confessions, the Gallican, it is true, sets the Epistle at the end of those of St. Paul: but the Belgic, Helvetic, and Bohemian Confessions cite and treat it as St. Paul's.

106. The exceptions to this prevailing view were found in certain Arminian divines, who, without impugning the authority of the Epistle, did not bind themselves to a belief of its Pauline origin. Such were Grotius, who inclines to the belief that it was written by St. Luke: Le Clerc, who holds Apollos to have been the Author: Limborch, who holds it to have been written "by some one of Paul's companions with his privity, and taken from his teaching:" and among the Socinians, Schlichting, who says of it, "though it had not Paul himself for its author, yet it came forth, if I may so say, from his manufactory, i. e. was written by some one of his friends and companions, and that by Paul's instigation, and in his spirit."

107. There was also a growing disposition, both in the Romish and in the reformed churches, to erect into an article of faith the Pauline origin, and to deal severely with those who presumed to doubt it. Many learned men, especially among Protestants, appeared as its defenders: among whom we may especially notice Spanheim (the younger, 1659), Braun and D'Outrein in Holland, our own Owen (1667), Mill (1707), Hallet (the younger, 1727), Carpzov (1750), Sykes (1755), J. C. Wolf (1734), and Andr. Cramer (1757), to whom Bleek adjudges the first place among the upholders of the Pauline authorship.

108. Since the middle of the last century, the ancient doubts have revived in Germany; and in the progress of more extended and accurate critical enquiry, have now become almost universal. The first that carefully treated the matter with this view was Semler (1763), in his edition of Baumgarten's Commentary on the Epistle. Then followed Michaelis, in the later editions of his Introduction: in the earlier, he had assumed the Pauline authorship. The same doubts were repeated and enforced by Ziegler, J. E. C. Schmidt (1804), Eichhorn (1812), Bertholdt (1819), David Schulz (who carried the contrast which he endeavours to establish between the Writer of this Epistle and St. Paul to an unreasonable length, and thereby rather hindered than helped that side of the argument), Seyfflerth (who sets himself to demonstrate from the Epistle itself, that it cannot have been written by St. Paul, but has no hypothesis respecting the Writer), Böhme (who holds Silvanus to have been the Writer, from similarities which he traces between our Epistle and 1 Peter, the Greek of which he holds also to have proceeded from him), De Wette

(who inclines to Apollos as the author, but sees an improbability in his ever having been in so close a relation to the Jewish Christians of Palestine), Tholuck (whose very valuable and candid enquiry in his last edition results in a leaning towards Apollos as the Writer), Bleek (whose view is mainly the same), Wieseler (who supports Barnabas as the probable Writer), Lünemann (who strongly upholds Apollos), Ebrard (who holds St. Paul to have been the Author, St. Luke the Writer), Delitzsch (who holds St. Luke to have been the Writer).

109. The principal modern upholders of the purely Pauline authorship in Germany have been Bengel (died 1752), Storr (1789), and recently Hofmann.

110. In our own country, the belief of the direct Pauline origin, though much shaken at the Reformation<sup>1</sup>, has recovered its ground far more extensively. The unwillingness to disturb settled opinion on the one hand, and it may be the disposition of our countrymen to take up opinions in furtherance of strong party bias, and their consequent inaptitude for candid critical research on the other, have mainly contributed to this result. Most of our recent Theologians and Commentators are to be found on this side. Among these may be mentioned Whitby, Macknight, Doddridge, Lardner, Stuart (American), Forster (Apostolical Authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews), Conybeare and Howson (Life of St. Paul), Davidson (Introd. to New Test.), and Dr. Wordsworth, in the recently published third vol. of his Greek Testament.

111. I am obliged, before passing to the internal grounds on which the question is to be treated, to lay down again the position in which we are left by the preceding sketch of the history of opinion.

112. It is manifest that with testimony so divided, antiquity cannot claim to close up the enquiry: nor can either side allege its voice as decisive. In the very earliest times, we find the Epistle received by some as St. Paul's: in the same times, we find it ascribed by others, and those men of full as much weight, to various other authors.

113. I briefly thus restate what has already been insisted on in paragraphs 35—40, because the time has not yet entirely passed by, when writers on the subject regard our speculations concerning the probable author of the Epistle as limited by these broken fragments of the rumours of antiquity: when a zealous and diligent writer among ourselves allows himself to treat with levity and contempt the opinion that Apollos wrote it, simply on the ground that he is a claimant "altogether unnoticed by Christian antiquity<sup>2</sup>." What we require is this: that we of this age should be allowed to do just that which the "ancient men" did in their age,—examine the Epistle simply and freely for and by itself, and form our conclusion accordingly, as to its Author, readers, and date : having respect indeed to ancient tradition, where we can find it, but not, where it is so broken, and inconsistent with itself, bound by any one of its assertions, or limited in our conclusions by its extent.

114. I now proceed to the latter and more important portion of our enquiry : whether the internal phenomena of the Epistle itself point to St. Paul as its Author and Writer,—or Author without being the Writer,—and if they do not either of these, whom, as an Author, their general character may be regarded as indicating.

115. But as this portion is most important, so has it been most diligently and ingeniously followed out by disputants on both sides. And it is not my intention to enter here on the often-fought battle of comparisons of terms once occurring, and tabular statements of words and phrases. The reader will find these given at great length and with much fairness in Davidson, who holds the balance evenly between previous disputants. And if he wishes to go still further into so wide a field of discussion, he may consult Mr. Forster's large volume, which is equally fertile in materials for both conclusions, often without the writer being conscious that it is so<sup>3</sup>.

116. The various items of evidence on this head can hardly be presented, in their fulness, to the mere English reader. He must in great measure take for granted the results, as presented to the student of the original Greek in the references throughout the Epistle in my Greek Test. It there appears, as indeed in the tables in any of the writers on the subject,—how like, and yet how unlike, the style of our Epistle is to that of the great Apostle : how completely the researches of such books as Mr. Forster's have succeeded in proving the likeness, how completely at the same time they have failed to remove one iota of the unlikeness ; so that the more we read and are borne along with their reasonings, the closer the connexion becomes, in faith and in feeling, of the writer of the Epistle with St. Paul, but the more absolutely incompatible the personal identity : the more we perceive all that region of style and diction to have been in common between them, which men living together, talking together, praying together, teaching together, would naturally range in ; but all that region wherein individual peculiarity is wont to put itself forth, to have been entirely distinct.

117. I need only mention the different tinge given to the same or similar thoughts ; the wholly differing rhythm of sentences wherein perhaps many words occur in common ; the differing spirit of cita-

<sup>3</sup> As e. g. when he alleges, which he often does, the same thought expressed by different words, or different cognate forms of the same root, in Hebrews and the Pauline Epistles, as indicating identity of authorship. The conclusion of most examiners of evidence would be in the opposite direction.

tion (to say nothing of the varying mode of citing); the totally distinct mode of arguing; the rhetorical accumulation; the equilibrium, even in the midst of fervid declamation, of periods and clauses; the use of different inferential and connecting particles. All of these great and undeniable variations may be easily indeed frittered down by an appearance of exceptions ranged in tables; but still are indelibly impressed on the mind of every intelligent student of the Epistle, and as has been observed, are unanswerable, just in proportion as the points of similarity are detailed and insisted on<sup>4</sup>.

118. It is again of course easy enough to meet such considerations in either of two ways; the former of which recommends itself to the mind which fears to enquire from motives of reverence, the latter to the superficial and indolent.

119. It may be said, that the Holy Spirit of God, by whose inspiration holy men have written these books of the New Testament, may bring it about, that the same person may write variously at different times, even be that variety out of the limits of human experience: that the same man, for instance, should have written the Epistle to the Romans and the First Epistle of St. John. In answer to which we may safely say, that what the Holy Spirit may or can do, is not for us to speculate upon: in this His proceeding of inspiration, He has given us abundant and undeniable examples of what He has done: and by such examples are we to be guided, in all questions as to the analogy of His proceedings in more doubtful cases. As matter of fact, the style and diction of St. Paul differ as much from those of St. John as can well be conceived. When therefore we find in the sacred writings phenomena of difference apparently incompatible with personal identity in their authors, we are not to be precluded from reasoning from them to the non-identity of such authors, by any vague assertions of the omnipotence of the Almighty Spirit.

120. Again it may be strongly urged, that the same person, writing at different times, and to different persons, may employ very various modes of diction and argument. Nothing can be truer than this: but the application of it to the question of identity of authorship is matter of penetration and appreciation. Details of diversity, which may be convincing to one man, may be wholly inappreciable, from various reasons, by another. As regards the matter before us, it may suffice to say, that the incompatibility of styles was felt in the earliest days by Greeks themselves, as the preceding testimonies from Clement of Alexandria and Origen may serve to shew. Further than this we can say nothing, which will be allowed as of any weight by those who unfortunately fail to appreciate the difference. We can only repeat our assurance, that the more acumen and scholarship are brought to bear on the enquiry, aided by a fairly judging and unbiassed mind, the more such incompatibility will be felt: and say, in the words of Origen cited above, par. 19, "That the character of the style has not the individual peculiarity of that of the Apostle, every one who knows how to judge of the difference of phrases will acknowledge."

121. I now proceed to consider the principal notices in the Epistle itself, which have been either justly or unjustly adduced, as making for or against the Pauline authorship.

122. In ch. xiii. 23, we read, "Know ye (or, ye know) that our brother Timotheus is set at liberty: with whom, if he come soon, I will see you." This notice has been cited with equal confidence on both sides. The natural inference from it, apart altogether from the controversy, would be, that the Writer of the Epistle was in some other place than Timotheus, who had been recently set free from an imprisonment (for this and no other is the meaning of the participle), and that he was awaiting Timotheus's arrival: on which, if it took place soon, he hoped to visit the Hebrews in his company.

123. It is manifest, that such a situation would fit very well some point of time after St. Paul's liberation from his first Roman imprisonment. Supposing that he was dismissed before Timotheus, and, having left Rome, expecting him to follow, had just received the news of his liberation, the words in the text would very well and naturally express this. It is true, we read of no such imprisonment of Timotheus: and this fact seems to remove the date of the occurrence out of the limits of the chronology of the Pauline Epistles. But if the command of the Apostle in 2 Tim. iv. 9 was obeyed, and Timotheus, on arriving, shared his imprisonment, the situation here alluded to may have occurred not long after.

124. On the other hand, the notice would equally well fit some companion of St. Paul, either St. Luke, or Silvanus, or Apollos, writing after the Apostle's death. All these would speak of Timotheus as our brother.

125. On the whole then, this passage carries no weight on either side. I own that the expression, "I will see you," has a tinge of authority about it, which hardly seems to fit either of the above-mentioned persons. But this impression may be fallacious: and it is only one of those cases where, in a matter so doubtful as the authorship of this Epistle, we are swayed hither and thither by words and expressions, which perhaps after all have no right to be so seriously taken.

126. Similar remarks might be made on the notice of ch. xiii. 25, "They from Italy salute you," as carrying no weight either way. As regards its meaning, it is indeed surprising that Bleek should maintain, that it excludes the supposition of the writer being in Italy, in the face of the classical and New Test. usage of the prepositions of origin. The preposition may doubtless be taken as used with reference to those who were to receive the salutation : it may be the salutation, not the persons, which the preposition brings away from Italy. It may be as if I were to write to a friend, "I have the best wishes for you from Canterbury:" which, although it would not be the most usual way of expressing my meaning, and might be said if I were elsewhere, yet would be far from excluding the supposition that I was myself writing from that city<sup>5</sup>.

127. If the words then do not forbid the idea that the Writer was in Italy, I do not see how they can be used for or against the Pauline authorship. As observed before, the Apostle may have been somewhere in that country waiting for Timotheus, when liberated, to join him. And we may say the same with equal probability of any of St. Paul's companions to whom the Epistle has been ascribed. The only evidence which can be gathered from the words, as being exceedingly unlike any thing occurring in the manifold formulæ of salutation in St. Paul's Epistles, is of a slighter, but to my mind of a more decisive kind.

128. The evidence supposed to be derivable from ch. x. 34 in the received text, "for ye had compassion on my bonds," vanishes with the adoption of the reading ye had compassion on prisoners, in which almost all the critical editors concur.

129. The notice ch. xiii. 7, Remember them that have the rule over you, &c., will more properly come under consideration when we are treating of the probable readers, and of the date of the Epistle<sup>6</sup>. I may say thus much in anticipation, that it can hardly be fairly interpreted consistently with the known traditions of the death of St. Paul, and at the same time with the hypothesis of his Authorship.

130. The well-known passage, ch. ii. 3, requires more consideration. It stands thus :

How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation, which began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed to us by them that heard [Him] ?

The difficulty, that St. Paul should thus include himself among those who had received the Gospel only at second hand, whereas in Gal. i. 12 he says of it, "For I received it not from man, neither was taught it, but by revelation of Jesus Christ," has been felt both in ancient and modern times. Euthalius, Œcumenius, and Theophylact, Luther, Calvin, and all the moderns, have alleged it, either to press or to explain the difficulty.

I must own that, in spite of all which has been so ingeniously said by way of explanation by the advocates of the Pauline authorship, the words appear to me quite irreconcilable with that hypothesis.

131. To pass by the ancient explanations, which will hardly be adopted in our own day<sup>7</sup>,—the most prevalent modern one has been, that the Apostle here adopts the figure called condescension, by which a writer or speaker identifies himself with his readers or hearers, even though, as a matter of actual fact, that identification is not borne out strictly. Such “condescension” is most commonly found in hortatory passages, but is not confined to them. A writer may, for the purpose of his argument, and to carry persuasion, place himself on a level with his readers in respect of matters of history, just as well as of moral considerations. The real question for us is, whether this is a case in which such a figure would be likely to be employed.

132. And to this the answer must be, it seems to me, unhesitatingly in the negative. That an Apostle, who ever claimed to have received the Gospel not from men but from the Lord Himself,—who was careful to state that when he met the chief Apostles in council they added nothing to him, should at all, and especially in writing (as the hypothesis generally assumes) to the very church where the influence of those other Apostles was at its highest, place himself on a level with their disciples as to the reception of the Gospel from them,—is a supposition so wholly improbable, that I cannot explain its having been held by so many men of discernment, except on the supposition that their bias towards the Pauline authorship has blinded them to the well-known character and habit of the Apostle.

133. And to reply to this, that he thus speaks of himself when his apostolical authority is called in question, as it was in the Galatian church, and partially also in the Corinthian, but does not so where no such slight had been put upon his office, is simply to advance that which is not the fact: for he does the same in an emphatic manner in Eph. iii. 2, 3, in which Epistle, to whomsoever addressed, there exist no traces of any rivalry to his own authority being in his view.

134. Certain other passages have been adduced as bearing out the idea of the figure of condescension here. But none of them, when fairly considered, really does so. For to take them one by one:—

In Eph. ii. 3, Col. i. 12, 13, Tit. iii. 3, there is no such figure, but the Apostle is simply stating the matter of fact, and counts himself to have been one of those spoken of.

In 1 Cor. xi. 31, 32, he is asserting that which is true of all Christians equally; himself, as liable to fall into sin and thus to need chastisement, being included.

<sup>7</sup> See them in the note on this par. in my Greek Test.

In 1 Thess. iv. 17,—where see note,—there is no such figure, for the Apostle is merely giving expression to the expectation that he himself should be among them who should be alive in the flesh at the coming of our Lord.

In Jude, ver. 17, there is no such figure. St. Jude, in writing thus, is giving us plain proof that he himself was not one of the Apostles.

135. Much stress has been laid, and duly, on the entire absence of personal notices of the Writer, as affecting the question of the Pauline authorship. This is so inconsistent with the otherwise invariable practice of St. Paul, that some very strong reason must be supposed, which should influence him in this case to depart from that practice. Such reason has been variously assigned. And first, with reference to the omission of any superscription or opening greeting. It has been supposed that he would not begin by designating himself as an Apostle, because the Lord Himself was the Apostle (ch. iii. 1) of the Jewish people (so Pantænus, above, par. 11). Or, because the Jewish Christians in Palestine were unwilling to recognize him as such, only as an Apostle to the Gentiles (so Theodoret, and others). But to this it might be answered, Why then not superscribe himself "a servant of Jesus Christ," or the like, as in Phil. i. 1, Philem. 1, or simply "Paul," as in 1 and 2 Thess.? But a further reply has been given, and very widely accepted: that being in disfavour generally among the Jews, he did not prefix his name, for fear of exciting a prejudice against his Epistle, and so perhaps preventing the reading of it altogether. (So Clement of Alexandria, above, par. 14. So also Chrysostom, iii. p. 371.) But this cannot have been the purpose of the Author throughout, as is sufficiently shewn by such notices as those of ch. xiii. 18, 19, 23, which would have been entirely without meaning, had the readers not been aware who was writing to them. Yet, it is said, these notices do not occur till the end of the Epistle, when the important part of it has already been read through. Are we then to suppose that St. Paul seriously did in this case, that which he ironically puts as an hypothesis in 2 Cor. xii. 16, "being crafty I caught you with guile"? And if he did it, how imperfectly and clumsily! Could he not as easily have removed all traces of his own hand in the Epistle, as those at the beginning only? And how are we to suppose that the Epistle came to the church to which it was addressed? Did he put in at a window, or over a wall? Must it not have come by the hand of some friend or companion? Must it not have been given into the hand of some that had the rule? How happened it that the question was never asked, From whom does this come? or if asked, how could it be answered but in one way? And when thus answered, how could it fail but the Epistle would thenceforth be known as that of St. Paul?

136. It may be said that these last enquiries would prove too much;

that they would equally apply, whoever wrote the Epistle; and that the name of the Author was, on the view which they imply, equally sure to have been attached to it. But we may well answer, that this, however plausible, is not so in reality. It does not follow, because the name of the great Apostle was sure to be attached to it if he really wrote it, that every other name was equally sure. Many of his disciples and companions, eminent as they were, bore no authority to be compared with his. This is true even of Luke and Barnabas: much more of Titus, Silas, and Clement. And if one of these had been the acknowledged author, there being no notices in the Epistle itself whereby he might be with certainty recognized after the first circumstances of its sending were forgotten, how probable, that a writing, committed to the keeping of a particular church, should have been retained indeed as a sacred deposit by them, but, in the midst of persecutions and troubles, have lost the merely traditional designation which never had become inseparable from it. In the one case, the name of St. Paul would commend the Epistle, and so would take the first, and an inalienable place: in the other, the weight and preciousness of the Epistle would survive the name of its Writer, which would not of itself have been its commendation. The like might have happened to the Gospel, or Acts, of St. Luke, but for the fact, that in this case not one particular church, but the whole Christian world, was the guardian of the deposit, and of the tradition attached to it.

137. Another solution has been suggested by Steudel: that the book has more the character of a treatise than of an Epistle, and therefore was not begun in epistolary form: some letter being probably sent with it, or the customary personal messages being orally delivered. But the postulate may be safely denied. Our Epistle is veritably an Epistle: addressed to readers of whom certain facts were specially true, containing exhortations founded on those facts, and notices arising out of the relation of the writer to his readers; which last sufficiently shew, that no other Epistle could have accompanied it, nor indeed any considerable trusting to the oral supplementing of its notices.

138. Yet another solution has been given by Hug and Spanheim: that in an oratorical style like that of the opening of this Epistle, it was not probable that a superscription would precede. True: but what, when conceded, does this indicate? Is it not just as good an argument to shew that one who never begins his Epistles thus, is not the Writer, as to account for his beginning thus, supposing him the Writer? The reason for our Epistle beginning as it does is, unquestionably, the character of the whole, containing few personal notices of the relation of the Writer to his readers. But granted, as we have sufficiently shewn, that it was not the object of the Author to remain unknown to his readers, I ask any one capable of forming an unbiassed judgment, is it possible that were St. Paul that author, and any conceivable Hebrew church those readers, no more notices should be found, not perhaps of his Apostleship, but of the revelations of the Lord to him, of his pure intent and love towards them? Any one who can suppose this, appears to me, I own,—however it may savour of presumption to say so,—deficient in appreciation of the phenomena of our Epistle, and still more of the character of the great Apostle himself.

139. In Bleek's Introduction to his Commentary, on which, in the main features, this part of my Introduction is founded, several interesting considerations are here adduced as bearing on the question of the authorship, arising out of the manner in which various points which arise are dealt with, as compared with the manner usual with St. Paul. Such considerations are valuable, and come powerfully in aid of a conclusion otherwise forced upon us: but when that conclusion is not acquiesced in, they are easily diluted away by its opponents. They are rather confirmatory than conclusive: and have certainly not had justice done them by the supporters of the Pauline hypothesis; who, as they seem to themselves to have answered one after another of them, represent each in succession as the main ground on which the anti-pauline view is rested.

140. I would refer my English readers for the discussion of these points to Dr. Davidson's Introduction to the New Test., vol. iii., where they are for the most part treated fairly, though hardly with due appreciation of their necessarily subordinate place in the argument. The idea which a reader, otherwise uninformed, would derive from Dr. Davidson's paragraphs, is that those who allege these considerations make them at least co-ordinate with others, of which they in reality only come in aid.

141. The same may be said of the whole mass of evidence resting on modes of citation, words only once found, style of periods, and the like. It abounds on the one hand with striking coincidences, on the other with striking discrepancies: each of these has been made much of by the ardent fautors of each side,—while the more impartial Commentators have weighed both together. The general conclusion in my own mind derived from these is, that the author of this Epistle cannot have been the same with the author of the Pauline Epistles. The coincidences are for the most part those which belong to men of the same general cast of thought on the great matters in hand: the discrepancies are in turns of expression, use of different particles, different rhythm, different compounds of cognate words, a mode of citation not independent but rather divergent,—and a thousand minor matters which it is easy for those to laugh to scorn who are incapable of estimating their combined evidence, but which when combined render the hypothesis of one and the same author entirely untenable.

142. To the phenomena of citation in our Epistle I shall have occasion to advert very soon, when dealing with the enquiry who the author really was. (See below, parr. 149, 152, 158, 180.) The reader will find them treated at great length in Bleek, Davidson, and Forster.

143. Before advancing to clear the way for that enquiry by other considerations, I will beg the reader to look back with me once more over the course and bearing of the external evidence as regards the Pauline hypothesis.

144. The recognition of the Epistle as Pauline begins about the middle of the second century, and, in one portion only of the church—the Alexandrine. Did this rest on an original historical tradition? We have seen reason to conclude the negative. Was it an inference from the subject and contents of the Epistle, which, when once made, gained more and more acceptance, from the very nature of the case? This, on all grounds, is more probable. Had an ancient tradition connected the name of St. Paul with it, we should find that name so connected not in one portion only, but in every part of the church. This however we do not find. We have no trace of its early recognition as Pauline elsewhere than in Alexandria. And even there, the earliest testimonies imply that there was doubt on the subject. Elsewhere, various opinions prevailed. Tertullian gives us Barnabas: Origen mentions two views, pointing to St. Luke and to Clement of Rome. None of these claim our acceptance as grounded on authentic historical tradition. But each of them has as much right to be heard and considered, as the Alexandrine. And the more, because that was so easy a deduction from the contents of the Epistle, and so sure to be embraced generally, whereas they had no such source, and could have no such advantage.

145. But there was one view of our Epistle, which never laboured under the uncertainty and insufficient reception which may be charged against the others: viz., that entertained by the church of Rome. It is true, its testimony is only negative: it amounts barely to this,—“The Epistle is not St. Paul’s.” But this evidence it gives “always, every where, by all.” And its testimony is of a date and kind which far outweighs the Alexandrine, or any other. Clement of Rome, the disciple of the Apostles, refers frequently and copiously to our Epistle, not indeed by name, but so plainly and unmistakeably that no one can well deny it. He evidently knew the Epistle well, and used it much and approvingly. Now, had he recognized it as written by St. Paul,—he might not indeed have cited it as such, seeing that unacknowledged centos of New Test. expressions are very common with him,—but is it conceivable that he should altogether have concealed such his recognition from the church over which he presided? Is it not certain, that had Clement received it as the work of St. Paul, we should have found that tradition dominant and firmly fixed in the Roman church? But that church is just the one, where we find no trace of such a tradition : a fact wholly irreconcilable with such recognition by Clement. And if Clement did not so recognize it, are we not thereby brought very much nearer the source itself, than by any reported opinion in the church of Alexandria ?

146. I shall have occasion again to return to this consideration : I introduce it here to shew, that in freely proposing to ourselves the enquiry, "Who wrote the Epistle ?" as to be answered entirely from the Epistle itself, we are not setting aside, but are strictly following, the earliest and weightiest historical testimonies respecting it, and the inferences to be deduced from them. And if any name seems to satisfy the requirements of the Epistle itself, those who in modern times suggested that name, and those who see reason to adopt it, are not to be held up to derision, as has been done by Mr. Forster, merely because that name was not suggested by any among the ancients. The question is as open now as it was in the second century. They had no reliable tradition : we have none. If an author is to be found, it must be by consideration of the subject-matter itself.

147. With these remarks, I come now to the enquiries, 1) What data does the Epistle furnish for determining the Author ? and 2) In what one person do those characteristics meet ?

148. 1. a) The WRITER of the Epistle is also the AUTHOR. It is of course possible, that St. Paul may have imparted his thoughts to the Hebrew church by means of another. This may have been done in one of two ways : either by actual translation, or by transfusion of thought and argument : setting aside altogether the wholly unlikely hypothesis, that the Epistle was drawn up and sent as St. Paul's by some other, without his knowledge and consent.

149. But first, the Epistle is NOT A TRANSLATION. The citations throughout, with one exception (noticed below, § ii. par. 35 note), are from the Septuagint Greek version of the Old Test., and are of such a kind, that the peculiarities of that version are not unfrequently interwoven into the argument, and made to contribute towards the result : which would be impossible, had the Epistle existed primarily in Hebrew. Besides, the prevalence of alliterations and plays on words, and the Greek rhythm, to which so many rhetorical passages owe their force, would of themselves compel us to this conclusion<sup>8</sup>.

150. And secondly, there are insuperable difficulties in the way of the hypothesis of any such secondary authorship as has very commonly been assumed, from the time of Origen downwards. Against this militate in their full strength all the considerations derived from those differences of style and diction, which as in this Epistle are inseparably interwoven into the argument : against this the whole arrangement and argumentation of the Epistle, which are very different from those of St. Paul, shewing an independence and originality which could hardly have been found in the work of one who wrote down the thoughts of another: against this also the few personal notices which occur, and which manifestly belong to the Author of the Epistle. Supposing St. Paul to be speaking by another in all other places, how are we to make the transition in these? The notices, which on the hypothesis of pure Pauline Authorship, seemed difficult of explanation, appear to me absolutely to defy it, if the secondary authorship be supposed.

151. b) The Author of the Epistle was a Jew. This, as far as I know, has never been doubted. The degree of intimate acquaintance shewn with the ceremonial law might perhaps have been acquired by a Gentile convert: but the manner in which he addresses his readers, evidently themselves Jews, is such as to forbid the supposition that he was himself a Gentile. Probability is entirely against such an address being used: and also entirely against the Epistle finding acceptance, if it had been used.

152. c) He was, however, not a pure Jew, speaking and quoting Hebrew: but a HELLENIST; i.e., a Jew brought up in Greek habits of thought, and in the constant use of the Septuagint version. His citations are from that version, and he grounds his argument, or places his reason for citing, on the words and expressions of the Septuagint, even where no corresponding terms are found in the Hebrew text.

153. d) He was one intimately acquainted with the way of thought, and writings, of St. Paul. I need not stay here to prove this. The elaborate tables which have been drawn up to prove the Pauline authorship are here very valuable to us, as we found them before in shewing the differences between the two writers. Dr. Davidson, Mr. Forster, or Bleek, in his perhaps more pertinent selections from the mass, will in a few minutes establish this to the satisfaction of any intelligent reader. That our author has more especially used one portion of the writings of the great Apostle, and why, will come under our notice in a following section.

154. e) And, considering the probable date of the Epistle, which I shall by anticipation assume to have been written before the destruction of Jerusalem, such a degree of acquaintance with the thoughts and writings of St. Paul could hardly, at such a time, have been the result of mere reading, but must have been derived from intimate acquaintance, as a companion and fellow-labourer, with the great Apostle himself. The same inference is confirmed by finding that our author was nearly connected with Timotheus, the son in the faith, and constant companion of St. Paul.

155. f) It is moreover necessary to assume, that the Author of our Epistle was deeply imbued with the thoughts and phrasology of the Alexandrian school. The coincidences in thought and language between passages of this Epistle and the writings of Philo, the Alexandrian Jew, are such as no one in his senses can believe to be fortuitous. These are for the most part noticed in the references, and the Commentary, in my Greek Testament.

156. These coincidences may have arisen from one of two reasons: either merely from the Author being acquainted with the writings of Philo, or from his having been educated in the same theological school with that philosopher, and so having acquired similar ways of thought and expression. The latter of these alternatives is on all grounds, and mainly from the nature of the coincidences themselves, the more probable. By birth or by training, he was an Alexandrian; not necessarily the former, for there were other great schools of Alexandrian learning besides the central one in that city, one of the most celebrated of which was at Tarsus, the birth-place of the apostle Paul. So that this consideration will not of itself fix the authorship on that companion of St. Paul whom we know to have been an Alexandrian by birth.

157. g) The author was not an Apostle, nor, in the strictest sense, a contemporary of the Apostles, so that he should have seen and heard our Lord for himself. He belongs to the second rank, in point of time, of apostolic men,—to those who heard from eye and ear-witnesses. This will follow from the consideration of the passage, ch. ii. 3, in par. 130—132 above.

158. h) We may add to the above data some, which although less secure, yet seem to be matters of sound inference from the Epistle itself. Of such a character are, e. g., that the author was not a dweller in or near Jerusalem, or he would have taken his descriptions rather from the then standing Jewish temple, than from the ordinances in the text of the Septuagint version:—that he was a person of considerable note and influence with those to whom he wrote, as may be inferred from the whole spirit and tone of his address to them: that he stood in some position of previous connexion with his readers, as appears from the words “that I may be restored to you,” ch. xiii. 19: that he lived and wrote before the destruction of Jerusalem.

159. 2. It will be impossible to apply the whole of these data to the enquiry respecting individual men, without assuming, with regard to the last two mentioned at least, the result of the two following sections, “For what readers the Epistle was written,” and “The place and time of writing.” I shall therefore suspend the consideration of those tests till the results shall have been arrived at<sup>9</sup>, and meantime apply the others to such persons as are given us by history to choose from.

160. These are the following: Barnabas, Luke, Clement, Mark, Titus, Apollos, Silvanus, Aquila. These are all the companions of St. Paul, who were of note enough to have written such an Epistle: with the exception of Timotheus, who is excluded from the list, by being mentioned in the Epistle (ch. xiii. 23) as a different person from the Author.

161. Of these, TITUS is excluded by the fact mentioned Gal. ii. 3,—that he was a Greek, and not circumcised even at the time when he accompanied St. Paul in his third journey to Jerusalem, Acts xv. 2, 3 ff.

162. It is doubtful, whether a like consideration does not exclude ST. LUKE from the authorship of our Epistle. Certainly the first appearance of Col. iv. 10—14 numbers him among those who were not of the circumcision. Were this so, it would be impossible to allot him more than a subordinate share in the composition. This has been felt, and the hypothesis which takes him to have been the writer has been shaped accordingly. Thus we have seen above Clement of Alexandria held him to have translated the Epistle into Greek<sup>1</sup>: and the idea that he wrote it under the superintendence of St. Paul, incorporating the thoughts of the great Apostle, has been of late revived, and defended with considerable skill, by Delitzsch. And such, more or less modified, has been the opinion of many, both ancients and moderns: of Luculentius, Primasius (Cent. VI.), Haymo (died 853), Rhabanus Maurus (about 847): and of Grotius, Crell, Stein, Köhler, Hug, Ebrard: several of the latter holding the independent authorship of St. Luke, which Delitzsch also concedes to have been possible.

163. And certainly, could we explain away the inference apparently unavoidable from Col. iv. 14, such a supposition would seem to have some support from the Epistle itself. The students of the Commentary in my Greek Test. will very frequently be struck by the verbal and idiomatic coincidences with the style of St. Luke. The argument, as resting on them, has been continually taken up and pushed forward by Delitzsch, and comes on his reader frequently with a force which at the time it is not easy to withstand.

164. Yet, it must be acknowledged, the hypothesis, though so frequently and so strongly supported by apparent coincidences, does not thoroughly approve itself to the critical mind. We cannot feel convinced that St. Luke did really write our Epistle. The whole tone of the individual mind, as far as it appears in the Gospel and Acts, is so essentially different from the spirit of the Writer here, that verbal and idiomatic coincidences do not carry us over the difficulty of supposing the two to be written by one and the same. There is nothing in St. Luke of the rhetorical balance, nothing of the accumulated and stately period<sup>2</sup>, nothing of the deep tinge which would be visible even in narrative, of the threatening of judgment. Within the limits of the same heavenly inspiration prompting both, St. Luke is rather the careful and kindly depicter of the blessings of the covenant, our Writer rather the messenger from God to the wavering, giving them the blessing and the curse to choose between: St. Luke is rather the polished Christian civilian, our Writer the fervid and prophetic rhetorician. The places of the two are different: and it would shake our confidence in the consistency of human characteristics under the influence of the Holy Spirit, were we to believe Luke, the beloved physician and Evangelist, to have become so changed, in the foundations and essentials of personal identity, as to have written this Epistle to the Hebrews.

165. If the preceding considerations have any weight, we must regard the coincidences above mentioned as the result of common education and manner of speech, and of common derivation of doctrine from the same personal source. St. Luke had derived his style from the same Alexandrine scholastic training, his doctrine from the same father in the faith, as the Writer of our Epistle.

166. It appears never to have been advanced as a serious hypothesis, that ST. MARK is the Writer of our Epistle. There are no points of coincidence between it and his Gospel, which would lead us to think so. He does not appear, after St. Paul's second missionary journey, ever to have been closely joined for any considerable time in travel or in missionary work with that Apostle: and again, he seems to have been a born Jerusalem Jew (Acts xii. 12: see Introd. to Vol. I. ch. iii. § 1), which, by what has been before said, would exclude him.

167. The fact that SILVANUS, or Silas, belonged to the church at Jerusalem (Acts xv. 22), would seem to exclude him also. In other points, our tests are satisfied by him. He was the constant companion of St. Paul: was imprisoned with him at Philippi (Acts xvi. 19 ff.), while Timothy remained at large: is ever named by the Apostle before Timothy (Acts xvii. 14, 15, xviii. 5; 2 Cor. i. 19; 1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1): and afterwards is found in close connexion with St. Peter also (1 Pet. v. 12). It must be acknowledged, that as far as mere negative reasons are concerned, with only the one exception above named, there seems no cause why Silvanus may not have written our Epistle. But every thing approaching to a positive reason is altogether wanting. We know absolutely nothing of the man, his learning, his particular training, or the likelihood that he should have given us such an Epistle as we now possess. His claim is (with that one reservation) unexceptionable : but it must retire before that of any who is recommended by positive considerations<sup>3</sup>.

168. A far stronger array of names and claims is made out for CLEMENT OF ROME, one of the fellow-workers of St. Paul in Phil. iv. 3. We have seen above (par. 19), that his name was one brought down to Origen by the "account which has come down to us," together with that of St. Luke : we have found him mentioned as held by some to be the translator, e. g., by Euthalius (par. 46), Eusebius (par. 48) : the author, by Philastrius (par. 65), Jerome (par. 69), &c. This latter has in modern times been the opinion of Erasmus (par. 97), and of Calvin (par. 100).

169. We cannot pronounce with any certainty whether Clement was a Jew by birth or not. The probability is against such a supposition. The advocates of this theory however rest his claim mainly on the fact that many expressions and passages of our Epistle occur in the (undoubtedly genuine) Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians.

170. But to this it has been satisfactorily replied by Bleek and others, that such passages have much more the air of citations, than that of repetitions of the same thought and diction by their original author, and that they in fact in no wise differ from the many other reproductions of passages of the New Test., especially of St. Paul's Epistles, in the same letter of Clement. Bleek has besides directed attention to the great dissimilarity of the two writings, as indicating different authors. Clement's Epistle has nothing of the Alexandrine character, nothing of the speculative spirit, of that to the Hebrews. His style is pure and correct, but wants altogether the march of periods, and rhetorical rhythm, of our Epistle. Another objection is, that had Clement written it, there could hardly have failed some trace of a tradition to that effect in the church of Rome ; which, as we have seen, is not found.

171. The idea that BARNABAS was the author of our Epistle seems to have been prevalent in the African Church, seeing that Tertullian quotes him as such without any doubt or explanation (above, par. 25). But it was unknown to Origen, and to Eusebius : and Jerome, in his Catalog. c. 5, vol. ii. p. 838, says "either of Barnabas according to Tertullian, or of the Evangelist Luke according to some, or of Clement, &c. : " so that it is probable that he recognized the notion as Tertullian's only. And we may fairly assume that Philastrinus (par. 65) and others refer to the same source, and that this view is destitute of any other external support than that which it gets from the passage of Tertullian<sup>4</sup>.

<sup>3</sup> Mynter and Böhme, from different points of view, have held to Silvanus: the former, assuming that our Epistle was sent with that to the Galatians, and to the same churches: the latter, fancying a great resemblance between our Epistle and the first of St. Peter, and holding it to have been written under the superintendence of that apostle: a supposition, I need not say, entirely untenable.

172. It must then, in common with the rest, stand or fall on internal grounds. And in thus judging of it, we have two alternatives before us. Either the extant Epistle of Barnabas is genuine, or it is not. In the former case, the question is soon decided. So different are the styles and characters of the two Epistles, so different also the view which they take of the Jewish rites and ordinances, that it is quite impossible to imagine them the work of the same writer. The Epistle of Barnabas maintains that the ceremonial commands were even at first uttered not in a literal but in a spiritual sense: finds childish allusions, e. g., in Greek numerals, to spiritual truths: is in its whole diction and character spiritless, and flat, and pointless. If any one imagines that the same writer could have indited both, then we are clearly out of the limits of ordinary reasoning and considerations of probability.

173. But we may take the other and more probable alternative: that the so-called Epistle of Barnabas is apocryphal. Judging then of Barnabas from what we know in the Acts, many particulars certainly seem to combine in favour of him. He was a Levite, not of Judæa, but of Cyprus (Acts iv. 36): he was intimately connected with St. Paul during the early part of the missionary journeys of that Apostle (Acts ix. 27, xv. 41), and in common with him was entrusted with the first ministry to the Gentiles (Acts xi. 22 ff., xv. 12, &c.; Gal. ii. 9, &c.): he was called by the Apostles (Acts iv. 36) by a name which we have seen reason to interpret 'son of exhortation.'

174. These particulars are made the most of by Wieseler, as supporting what he considers the only certain tradition on the subject. But as we have seen this tradition itself fail, so neither will these stand under stricter examination. For Barnabas, though by birth a Cyprian, yet dwelt apparently at Jerusalem (Acts ix. 27, xi. 22): and there, by the context of the narrative, must the field have been situated, which he sold to put its price into the common stock. As a Levite, he must have been thoroughly acquainted with the usages of the Jerusalem temple, which, as before observed, our Writer does not appear to have been. It is quite out of the question to suppose, as Wieseler does, that Barnabas, a Levite who had dwelt at Jerusalem, would, during a subsequent ministration in Egypt, have cited the usages of the temple at Leontopolis rather than those at Jerusalem. If such usages have been cited, it must be by an Egyptian Jew to whom Jerusalem was not familiar.

<sup>4</sup> It has been upheld in modern times by J. E. Chr.-Schmidt, Twæsten, Ullmann, Thiersch, Wieseler. On the last of these, see below, par. 174.

175. Perhaps too much has been made, on the other side, of the manifest inferiority of Barnabas to Paul in eloquence, and of the fact that as the history goes on in the Acts, the order becomes reversed, and from "Barnabas and Saul" or "Paul" (ch. xi. 30, xii. 25, xiii. 2, 7) we have "Paul and Barnabas" (ch. xiii. 43, 46, 50, xv. 2 twice, 22, 35, with only occasional intermixture of the old order, ch. xiv. 14, xv. 12, 25) : Barnabas gradually becoming eclipsed by the eminence of his far greater colleague. For 1) it is very possible that eloquence of the pen, such as that in our Epistle, might not have been wanting to one who was very inferior to St. Paul in eloquence of the tongue : and 2) it was most natural, that in a history written by a companion of St. Paul, and devoted, in its latter portion at least, to the Acts of St. Paul, the name of the great Apostle should gradually assume that pre-eminence to which on other grounds it was unquestionably entitled.

176. It would appear then, that against the authorship by Barnabas there can only be urged in fairness the one objection arising from his residence at Jerusalem : which on the hypothesis of the Epistle being addressed to the church at Jerusalem, would be a circumstance in his favour with reference to such expressions as that I may be restored to you, ch. xiii. 19 and the acquaintance with the readers implied throughout the Epistle. On the whole, it must be confessed, that this view comes nearest to satisfying the conditions of authorship of any that have as yet been treated ; and should only be set aside, if one approaching nearer still can be found.

177. It remains that we enquire into the claims of the two remaining apostolic persons on our list, AQUILA, and APOLLOS. The former of these, a Jew of Pontus by birth, was once, with his wife Priscilla, resident in Rome, but was found by St. Paul at Corinth on his first arrival there (Acts xviii. 2), having been compelled to quit the capital by a decree of Claudius. It is uncertain whether at that time he was a Christian ; but if not, he soon after became one by the companionship of the Apostle, who took up his abode, and wrought at their common trade of tent-making, with Aquila and Priscilla. After this, Aquila became a zealous forwarder of the Gospel. We find him (Acts xviii. 18) accompanying St. Paul to Ephesus, and in his company there when he wrote 1 Corinthians (1 Cor. xvi. 19) : again at Rome when the Epistle to the Romans was written (Rom. xvi. 3) : at Ephesus again when 2 Tim. was written (2 Tim. iv. 19).

178. From these places it appears, that Aquila was a person of considerable importance among the brethren : that the church used to assemble in his house : that he and his wife Priscilla had exposed their lives for the Gospel's sake. And from Acts xviii. 26 we find, that they were also well able to carry on the work of teaching, even with such a pupil as Apollos, who was mighty in the Scriptures.

179. It must be owned that these circumstances would constitute a fair prima facie case for Aquila, were it not for certain indications that he himself was rather the ready and zealous patron, than the teacher; and that this latter work, or a great share in it, seems to have belonged to his wife, Prisca or Priscilla. She is ever named with him, even Acts xviii. 26, where the instruction of Apollos is described: and not unfrequently her name precedes his (Acts xviii. 18; Rom. xvi. 3; 2 Tim. iv. 19); an arrangement so contrary to the custom of antiquity that some very sufficient reason must have existed for it. At all events, the grounds on which an hypothesis of Aquila's authorship of our Epistle would rest, must be purely of a negative kind, as far as personal capacity is concerned. And it does not appear that any, either in ancient or modern times, have fixed on him as its probable writer.

180. There is yet one name remaining, that of APOLLOS, in whom certainly more conditions meet than in any other man, both negative and positive, of the possible authorship of our Epistle. The language in which he is introduced in the Acts (xviii. 24) is very remarkable. He is there described as "a certain Jew, an Alexandrian by birth, an eloquent man, being mighty in the Scriptures." Every word here seems fitted to point him out as the person of whom we are in search. He is a Jew, born in Alexandria: here we have at once two great postulates fulfilled: here we at once might account for the Alexandrian language of the Epistle, and for the uniform use of the Septuagint version, mainly (if this be so) in its Alexandrian form. He is an eloquent man and mighty in the Scriptures. As we advance in the description, even minute coincidences seem to confirm our view that we are here at last on the right track. He is described as knowing only the baptism of John, but being more perfectly taught the way of the Lord by Aquila and Priscilla. No wonder then that a person so instituted should specify the doctrine of baptisms as one of the components in the foundation of the Christian life (Heb. vi. 2). It is described as his characteristic, that he began to speak boldly in the synagogue: is it wonderful then that he, of all New Test. writers, should exhort, Cast not away your boldness of speech or confidence (Heb. x. 35), and (using the same word) declare to his readers that they were the house of Christ if we hold fast our confidence (Heb. iii. 6)?

181. Nor, if we proceed to examine the further notices of him, does this first impression become weakened. In 1 Cor. i.—iv., we find him described by inference as most active and able, and only second to St. Paul himself in the church at Corinth. It would be difficult to select words which should more happily and exactly hit the relation of the Epistle to the Hebrews to the writings of St. Paul, than those of 1 Cor. iii. 6, "I planted, Apollos watered." And the eloquence and rhetorical richness of the style of Apollos seems to have been exactly that, wherein his teaching differed from that of the Apostle. It is impossible to help feeling that the frequent renunciations, on St. Paul's part, of words of excellency or human wisdom, have reference, partly, it may be, to some exaggeration of Apollos' manner of teaching by his disciples, but also to some infirmity, in this direction, of that teacher himself. Compare especially 2 Cor. xi. 3.

182. It is just this difference in style and rhetorical character, which, in this case elevated and chastened by the informing and pervading Spirit, distinguishes the present Epistle to the Hebrews from those of the great Apostle himself. And, just as it was not easy to imagine either St. Luke, or Clement, or Barnabas, to have written such an Epistle, so now we feel, from all the characteristics given us of Apollos in the sacred narrative, that if he wrote at all, it would be an Epistle precisely of this kind, both in contents, and in style.

183. For as to the former of these, the contents and argument of the Epistle, we have a weighty indication furnished by the passage in the Acts: "For he mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, shewing by the Scriptures that Jesus was the Christ." What words could more accurately describe, if not the very teaching itself, yet the opening of a course of argument likely, when the occasion offered, to lead to the teaching of our Epistle?

184. Again, we seem to have found in Apollos just that degree of dependence on St. Paul which we require, combined with that degree of independence which the writer of our Epistle must have had. Instructed originally in the elements of the Christian faith by Aquila and Priscilla, he naturally received it in that form in which the Great Apostle of the Gentiles especially loved to put it forth. His career however of Christian teaching began and was carried on at Corinth, without the personal superintendence of St. Paul: his line of arguing with and convincing the Jews did not, as St. Paul's, proceed on the covenant of justification by faith made by God with Abraham, but took a different direction, that namely of the eternal High-priesthood of Jesus, and the all-sufficiency of His one Sacrifice. Faith indeed with him occupies a place fully as important as that assigned to it by St. Paul: he does not however dwell on it mainly as the instrument of our justification before God, but as the necessary condition of approach to Him, and of persistence in our place as partakers of the heavenly calling<sup>5</sup>. The teaching of this Epistle is not indeed in any particular inconsistent with, but neither is it dependent on, the teaching of St. Paul's Epistles.

185. We may advance yet further in our estimate of the probability of Apollos having written as we find the Author of this Epistle writing.

The whole spirit of the First Epistle to the Corinthians shews us, that there had sprung up in the Corinthian church a rivalry between the two modes of teaching; unaccompanied by, as it assuredly was not caused by, any rivalry between the teachers themselves, except in so far as was of necessity the case from the very variety of the manner of teaching. And while the one fact, of the rivalry between the teachings and their disciples, is undeniable, the other fact, that of absence of rivalry between the Teachers, is shewn in a very interesting manner. On the side of St. Paul, by his constant and honourable mention of Apollos as his second and helper: by Apollos, in the circumstance mentioned 1 Cor. xvi. 12, that St. Paul had exhorted him to accompany to Corinth the bearers of that Epistle, but that he could not prevail on him to go at that time: he only promised a future visit at some favourable opportunity. Here, if I mistake not, we see the generous confidence of the Apostle, wishing Apollos to go to Corinth and prove, in spite of what had there taken place, the unity of the two apostolic men in the faith: here too, which is important to our present subject, we have the self-denying modesty of Apollos, unwilling to incur even the chance of being set at the head of a party against the Apostle, or in any way to obtrude himself personally, where St. Paul had sown the seed, now that there had grown up, on the part of some in that Church, a spirit of invidious personal comparison between the two.

186. If we have interpreted aright this hint of the feeling of Apollos as regarded St. Paul; if, as we may well suppose in one "fervent in spirit," such a feeling was deeply implanted and continued to actuate him,—what more likely to have given rise to the semi-anonymous character of our present Epistle? He has no reason for strict concealment of himself, but he has a strong reason for not putting himself prominently forward. He does not open with announcing his name, or sending a blessing in his own person: but neither does he write throughout as one who means to be unknown: and among the personal notices at the end he makes no secret of circumstances and connexions, which would be unintelligible, unless the readers were going along with a writer personally known to them. And thus the two-sided phenomena of our Epistle, utterly inexplicable as they have ever been on the hypothesis of Pauline authorship or superintendence, would receive a satisfactory explanation.

187. It will be plainly out of place to object, that this explanation would only hold, on the hypothesis that our Epistle was addressed to the Jews at Corinth. The same spirit of modest self-abnegation would hardly, after such an indication of it, be wanting in Apollos, to whatever church he was writing. But I reserve it for the next section to enquire how far this view is confirmed or impugned by our conclusion as to the church to which the Epistle was, in all probability, originally addressed <sup>6</sup>.

188. The history of the hypothesis that Apollos was the author of our Epistle, has been given by implication, from the time of Luther, its apparent originator, above in parr. 98—108. It may be convenient to give here, in one conspectus, the principal names in its favour: Luther, Osiander, Le Clerc, Heumann (1711), Lorenz Müller (1717), Semler, Ziegler, Dindorf, Bleek, Tholuck, Credner, Reuss, the R.-Catholics Feilmoser and Lutterbeck (the latter with this modification, that he believes St. Paul to have written the 9 last verses, and the rest to have been composed by Apollos in union with St. Luke, Clement, and other companions of the Apostle),—De Wette, Lünemann.

189. The objection which is commonly set against these probabilities is, that we have no ecclesiastical tradition pointing to Apollos: that it is unreasonable to suppose that the church to which the Epistle was sent should altogether have lost all trace of the name of an author who must have been personally known to them. This has been strongly urged, and by some, e. g. Mr. Forster, regarded as a ground for attempting to laugh to scorn the hypothesis, as altogether unworthy of serious consideration <sup>7</sup>.

190. But if any student has carefully followed the earlier paragraphs of this section, he will be fully prepared to meet such an objection, and will not be deterred from the humble search after truth by such scorn. He will remember how we shewed the failure of every attempt to establish a satisfactory footing for any view of the authorship as being the tradition of the church: and proved that, with regard to any research into the subject, we of this day approach it as those of old did in their day, with full liberty to judge from the data furnished by the Epistle itself.

191. And he will also bear in mind, that the day is happily passing away with Biblical writers and students, when the strong language of those, who were safe in the shelter of a long-prescribed and approved opinion, could deter any from humble and faithful research into the various phenomena of God's word itself: when the confession of having found insoluble difficulties was supposed to indicate unsoundness of faith, and the recognition of discrepancies was regarded as affecting the belief of divine inspiration. We have at last in this country begun to learn, that Holy Scripture shrinks not from any tests,

SECTION II.

FOR WHAT READERS IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. That the book before us is an Epistle, not a homily or treatise, is too plain to require more than a passing assertion. Its personal and circumstantial notices are inseparable from it, and the language is throughout epistolary, as far as the nature of the subject would permit.

2. And it is almost equally plain, that it is an Epistle addressed to JUDÆO-CHRISTIANS. The attempt to dispute this must be regarded rather as a curiosity of literature, than as worthy of serious attention. The evidence of the whole Epistle goes to show, that the readers had been Jews, and were in danger of apostatizing back into Judaism again. Not a syllable is found of allusions to their conversion from the alienation of heathenism, such as frequently occur in St. Paul's Epistles : but every where their original covenant state is assumed, and the fact of that covenant having been amplified and superseded by a better one is insisted on.

3. If then it was written to Judæo-Christians, on whom are we to think as its intended recipients ?

4. Was it addressed to the whole body of such converts throughout the world? This view has found some few respectable names to defend it. But it cannot be seriously entertained. The Epistle assumes throughout a local habitation, and a peculiar combination of circumstances, for those who are addressed : and concludes, not only with greetings from "those from Italy," but with an expressed intention of the Writer to visit those addressed, in company with Timotheus ; which would be impossible on this œcumenical hypothesis.

5. If then we are to choose some one church, the first occurring to us is the mother church at Jerusalem, perhaps united with the daughter churches in Palestine. And this, in one form or other, has been the usual opinion : countenanced by many phenomena in the Epistle itself. At and near Jerusalem, it is urged, a) would that attachment to the temple-worship be found which seems to be assumed on the part of the readers : there again b) were the only examples of churches almost purely Judaic in their composition : there only c) would such allusions as that to going forth to suffer with Christ "without the gate" (ch. xiii. 12), be understood and appreciated.

6. But these arguments are by no means weighty, much less decisive. For a) we do not find any signs in our Epistle that its readers were to be persons who had the temple-service before their eyes ; the Writer refers much more to his Septuagint, than to any existing practices : and men with their Bibles in their hands might well have been thus addressed, even if they had never witnessed the actual ceremonies themselves. Besides which, all Jews were supposed to be included in the temple-rites, wherever dwelling, and would doubtless be quite as familiar with them as there can be any reason here for assuming. And again, even granting the ground of the argument, its inference is not necessary, for there was another Jewish temple at Leontopolis in Egypt, wherein the Mosaic ordinances were observed.

7. With regard to b), it may well be answered, that such an exclusively Jewish church, as would be found in Palestine only, is not required for the purposes of our Epistle. It is beyond question that the Epistle of St. James was written to Jewish Christian converts ; yet it is expressly addressed to the dispersion outside Palestine, who must every where have been mingled with their Gentile brethren. Besides, it has been well remarked<sup>8</sup>, that the Epistle itself leads to no such assumption of an exclusively Jewish church. It might have been sent to a church in which both Jews and Gentiles were mingled, to find its own readers : and such an idea is countenanced by the exhortation, ch. xiii. 13, compared with the words "not forsaking the assembling of yourselves together," ch. x. 25. It has been well shown by Riehlm, that our Writer's whole procedure as concerns Gentile Christians can only be accounted for by his regarding the Jewish people—see ch. ii. 17, iv. 9, xiii. 12, ii. 16,—as the primary stock, into which all other men were to be engrafted for the purposes of salvation : as a theocratic rather than a physical development. For that the Lord Jesus tasted death on behalf of every man, is as undeniably his doctrine.

8. The argument c) is evidently not decisive. Wherever there were Jews, priding themselves on their own nationality, and acquainted with the facts of our Lord's death, such an exhortation might be used. The type is derived from the usage of the tabernacle ; the antitype, from a known historical fact : the exhortation is, as explained by Theodoret (see note on ch. xiii. 13), to come forth out of the then legal polity of Judaism, content to bear the reproach accruing in consequence : all of which would be as applicable any where, as in Palestine, or at Jerusalem.

9. There seems then to be at least no necessity for adopting Jerusalem or Palestine as containing the readers to whom our Epistle was addressed. But on the other hand there are reasons against such an hypothesis, of more or less weight. These I will state, not in order of their importance, but as they most naturally occur

<sup>8</sup> By Holzmann, in an article in the Studien und Kritiken, 1859, part ii. ; to which I have been indebted for several suggestions on this part of my subject.

10. The language and style of our Epistle, if it was addressed to Jews in Jerusalem or Palestine, is surely unaccountable. For, although Greek was commonly spoken in Palestine, yet on the one hand no writer who wished to obtain a favourable hearing with Jews there on matters regarding their own religion, would choose Greek as the medium of his communication (compare Acts xxii. 2). And the gospel of St. Matthew is no case in point: for whatever judgment we may form respecting the original language of our present gospel, there can be no doubt that the apostolic oral teaching, on which our first three gospels are founded, was originally extant in Aramaic: whereas it is impossible to suppose the Epistle to the Hebrews a translation, or originally extant in any other tongue than Greek. And, on the other hand, not only is our Epistle Greek, but it is such Greek, as necessarily presupposes some acquaintance with literature, some practice not merely in the colloquial, but in the scholastic Greek of the day. And this surely was as far as possible from being the case with the churches of Jerusalem and Palestine.

11. A weighty pendant to the same objection is found in the unvarying use of the Septuagint Greek version by our Writer, even, as in ch. i. 6, ii. 7, x. 5, where it differs from the Hebrew text. "How astonishing is this circumstance," says Wieseler, "if he was writing to inhabitants of Palestine, with whom that version had no authority!"

12. Another objection is, that it is not possible to conceive either of St. Paul himself or of any of his companions, that they should have stood in such a relation to the Jerusalem or Palestine churches, as we find subsisting between the Writer of our Epistle and his readers. To suppose such a relation in the case of the Apostle himself, is to cut ourselves loose from all the revealed facts of his course, and suppose a totally new mind to have sprung up in Jerusalem towards him. And least of all his companions could such a relation have subsisted in the case of Apollos and Timotheus; at least for many years, far more than history will allow, after the speech of St. James in Acts xxi. 20.

13. Connected with this last difficulty would be the impossibility, on the hypothesis now in question, of giving any satisfactory meaning to the notice in ch. xiii. 24, They from Italy salute you. If the Writer was, as often supposed, in Rome, how unnatural to specify the Jews residing there by this name! if in Italy, how unnatural again that he should send greeting from Christian Jews so widely scattered, thereby depriving the salutation of all reality! If again he was not in Rome nor in Italy, what reason can be suggested for his sending an especial salutation to Jews in Palestine from some present with him who happened to be from Italy? The former of these three suppositions is perhaps the least unlikely: but the least unlikely, how unlikely!

14. Again, the historical notices in our Epistle do not fit the hypothesis in question. The great notice of ch. ii. 3, would be strictly true of any church rather than that of Jerusalem, or those in Palestine generally. At any date that can reasonably be assigned for our Epistle (see below, § iii.), there must have been many living in those churches, who had heard the Lord for themselves. And though it may be said that they had, properly speaking, received the tidings of salvation from those that heard Him, yet such a body, among whom Jesus Himself had lived and moved in the flesh, would surely not be one of which to predicate the words in the text so simply and directly. Rather should we look for one of which they might be from the first and without controversy true.

15. Another historical notice is found ch. vi. 10, who have ministered to the saints, and do minister, which would be less applicable to the churches of Jerusalem and Palestine, than to any others. For it was they who were the objects, not the subjects of this ministration, throughout the ministry of St. Paul: and certainly from what we know of their history, their situation did not improve after that Apostle's death. This "ministration for the saints" was a duty enjoined by him on the churches of Galatia (1 Cor. xvi. 1; Rom. xv. 26), Macedonia, and Achaia, and doubtless by implication on other churches also (see Rom. xii. 13): the saints being the poor believers at Jerusalem. And though, as has been replied to this, some of the Jerusalem Christians may have been wealthy, and able to assist their poorer brethren, yet we must notice that the ministration here is predicated not of some among them, but of the church, as such, in general: which could not be said of the church in Jerusalem.

16. There are some notices, on which no stress can be laid either way, as for, or as against, the claim of the Jerusalem church. Such are, that found ch. xii. 4, which in the note there we have seen reason to apply rather to the figure there made use of, than to any concrete fact assignable in history: and that in ch. v. 12, which manifestly must not be taken to imply that no teachers had at that time proceeded from the particular church addressed, but that its members in general were behind what might have been expected of them in spiritual knowledge.

17. It may again be urged, that the absence, no less than the presence of historical allusions, makes against the hypothesis. If the Epistle were addressed to the church at Jerusalem, it seems strange that no allusion should be made in it to the fact that our Lord Himself had lived and taught among them in the flesh, had before their eyes suffered death on the Cross, had found among them the first witnesses of His Resurrection and Ascension.

18. If then we cannot fit our Epistle to the very widely spread assumption that it was addressed to the Jewish Christians of Jerusalem and Palestine, we must obviously put to the test, in search of its original readers, the various other churches which came within the working of St. Paul and his companions. Of many of these, which have in turn become the subjects of hypotheses, it is hardly necessary to give more than a list. Wall believed the Epistle to have been written to the Hebrew Christians of Proconsular Asia, Macedonia, and Greece: Sir J. Newton, Boltin, and Bengel, to Jews who had left Jerusalem on account of the war, and were settled in Asia Minor: Credner, to those in Lycaonia: Storr, Mynster, and Rinck, to those in Galatia: Lyra and Ludwig, to those in Spain: Semler and Nösselt, to those in Thessalonica: Böhme, to those in Antioch: Stein, to those in Laodicea (see the citation from Philastrius in § i. 65, and note); Röth, to those in Antioch: Baumgarten-Crusius, to those at Ephesus and Colossæ.

19. Several of these set out with the assumption of a Pauline authorship; and none of them seems to fulfil satisfactorily any of the main conditions of our problem. If it was to any one of these bodies of Jews that the Epistle was addressed, we know so little about any one of them, that the holding of such an opinion on our part can only be founded on the vaguest and wildest conjecture. To use arguments against such hypotheses, would be to fight with mere shadows.

20. But there are three churches yet remaining which will require more detailed discussion: CORINTH, ALEXANDRIA, and ROME. The reason for including the former of these in this list, rather than in the other, is, that on the view that Apollos was the Writer, the church in which he so long and so effectively laboured, seems to have a claim to be considered.

21. But the circumstances of the Jewish portion of the church at CORINTH were not such as to justify such an hypothesis. It does not appear to have been of sufficient importance in point of numbers: nor can the assertion that it was confirmed to us by those that heard [Him], of ch. ii. 3, have been asserted of them, seeing that they owed their conversion to the ministry of St. Paul.

22. ALEXANDRIA is maintained by Schmidt and Wieseler to have been the original destination of the Epistle. There, it is urged, were the greatest number of resident Jews, next to Jerusalem: there, at Leonopolis in Egypt, was another temple, with the arrangements of which the notices in our Epistle more nearly correspond than with those in Jerusalem: from thence the Epistle appears first to have come forth to the knowledge of the church. Add to which, the canon of Muratori (see above, § i. par. 31) speaks of an Epistle to the Alexandrines, which may probably designate our present Epistle. Besides all this, the Alexandrine character of the language, and treatment of subjects in the Epistle, and manner of citation, are urged, as pointing to Alexandrine readers.

23. And doubtless there is some weight in these considerations:

enough, in the mere balance of probabilities, to cause us to place this hypothesis far before all others which have as yet been treated. Still there are some circumstances to be taken into account, which rather weaken its probability. One of these is that, various as are the notices of the Epistle from early Alexandrine writers, we find no hint of its having been addressed to their own church, no certain tradition concerning its author. Another arises from the absence of all positive history of the church there in apostolic times, by which we might try, and verify, the few historic notices occurring in the Epistle. Indeed as far as the more personal of those notices are concerned, the same objections lie against Alexandria, as have before been urged against Palestine: the difficulty of assigning a reason for the salutation from those from Italy, and of imagining, within the limits which must be set to the date of the Epistle, any such relation of Timotheus to the readers, as is supposed in ch. xiii. 23.

24. These objections would lead us, at all events, to pass on to the end of our list before we attempt to pronounce on the preponderance of probability, and take into consideration the claims of ROME herself. These were in part put forward by Wetstein, and have recently been urged in Holzmann's article in the Studien u. Kritiken for 1859.

25. They may be briefly explained to be these: 1) The fact of the church at Rome being just such an one, in its origin and composition, as this Epistle seems to presuppose. It has been already seen (par. 7) that when, as we are compelled, we give up the idea of its having been addressed to a church exclusively consisting of Judæo-Christians, we necessarily are referred to one in which the Jewish believers formed a considerable portion, and that the primary stock and nucleus, of the church. Now this seems to have been the case at Rome, from the indications furnished us in the Epistle to the Romans. "The Jew first, and also the Gentile," is a note frequently struck in that Epistle; and the Church at Rome seems to be the only one of those with which St. Paul had been concerned, which would entirely answer to such a description.

26. 2) The great key to the present question, the historical notice, ch. ii. 3, fits exceedingly well the circumstances of the church of Rome. That church had arisen, not from the preaching of any Apostle among them, but from a confluence of primitive believers, the first having arrived there probably not long after our Lord's Ascension: see Acts ii. 10. In Rom. i. 8, written in all probability in the year 58 A.D., St. Paul states, "Your faith is spoken of in the whole world:" and in xvi. 19, "Your obedience hath come unto all men:" the inferences from which, and their proper limitation, I have discussed in the Introd. to that Epistle. And in Rom. xvi. 7, we find a salutation to Andronicus and Junias, Jews (see note there), "who are of note among the Apostles, who also were in Christ before me." So that here we have a church, the only one of all those with which St. Paul and his companions were concerned, of which it could be said, that the Gospel was confirmed to us by them that heard [Him]: the Apostle himself not having arrived there till long after such confirmation had taken place.

27. Again 3) it was in Rome, and Rome principally, that Judaistic Christianity took its further development and forms of error: it was there, not in Jerusalem and Palestine, that at this time the various and strange doctrines, against which the readers are warned, ch. xiii. 9, were springing up. "As soon as the gloom of the earliest history begins to clear a little, we find face to face at Rome Valentinians and Marcionites, Praxeas and the Montanists (Proclus), Hegesippus and the Elcesaites, Justin, and Polycarp. Here it was that there arose in the second half of the 2nd century the completest exposition of theosophic Judaism, the Clementines, the literary memorial of a manœuvre which had for its aim the absorption of the whole Roman Church into Judæo-Christianity<sup>9</sup>." We have glimpses of the beginning of this state of Judaistic development even in St. Paul's lifetime, at two distinct periods; when he wrote the Epistle to the Romans, about A.D. 58, compare Rom. xiv. xv. to ver. 13,—and later, in that to the Philippians, about A.D. 63 (see Introd. to that Epistle); and Phil. i. 14—17: again in the bitterness conveyed in "beware of the concision," and the following verses, Phil. iii. 2 ff.

28. It is also to be remarked 4) that the personal notices found in our Epistle agree remarkably well with the hypothesis that it was addressed to the Church at Rome. The information respecting Timothy could not come amiss to those who had been addressed in the words, "Timotheus my fellow-worker saluteth you," Rom. xvi. 21; who had been accustomed to the companionship of "Paul and Timotheus" among them, Phil. i. 1; Col. i. 1; Philem. 1: and the words, they from Italy salute you, of ch. xiii. 24, receive a far more likely interpretation than that conceded as possible above, § i. par. 126, if we believe the Writer to be addressing his Epistle from some place where were present with him Christians from Italy, who would be desirous of sending greeting to their brethren at home. If he was writing e. g. at Alexandria, or at Ephesus, or at Corinth, such a salutation would be very natural. And thus we should be giving to the phrase they from its most usual New Test. meaning, of persons who have come from the place indicated: see Matt. xv. 1; Acts vi. 9; x. 23. Even Bleek, who holds our Epistle to have been addressed to the church in Palestine, takes this view, and assigns as its place of writing, Ephesus or Corinth. But then, what sense would it have, to send greeting to Palestine from they from Italy?

• Holzmann.

29. Another set of important notices which this hypothesis will illustrate is found, where past persecution, and the death of eminent men in the church, are alluded to. These have ever presented, on the Palestine view, considerable difficulties. Any assignment of them to known historical occurrences would put them far too early for any probable date of our Epistle: and it has been felt that the deaths by martyrdom of St. Stephen, St. James the Great, and the like, were far from satisfying the expression, the decease of your leaders, which they were commanded to imitate: and though the time during which the Epistle must have reached Jerusalem was indeed one of great and unexampled trouble and disorganization, we know of no general persecution of Christians as such, since that which arose on account of Stephen, which was hardly likely to have been in the Writer's mind.

30. But on the Roman hypothesis, these passages are easily explained. About 49 or 50, Claudius, as Suetonius tells us, "expelled from Rome the Jews, who were continually stirring up tumults under the instigation of Chrestus." This time may well be alluded to by the expression, remember the former days, in ch. x. 32; for under the blundering expression, "at the instigation of Chrestus," it is impossible not to recognize troubles sprung from the rising of the Jews against the Christian converts. Thus also will the fact of the sympathy with prisoners receive a natural interpretation, as imprisonments and trials would necessarily have accompanied these "continual tumults," before the final step of expulsion took place: and the taking with joy the spoiling of their goods may be easily understood, either as a result of the tumults themselves, or of the expulsion, in which they had occasion to test their knowledge that they had for themselves a better and abiding possession.

31. It is true there are some particulars connected with this passage, which do not seem so well to fit that earlier time of trouble, as the Neronian persecution nearly fifteen years after. The only objection to taking that event as the one referred to, would be the expression the former days, and the implication conveyed in the assertion, that they then suffered affliction after they were enlightened: considering that we cannot go beyond the destruction of Jerusalem, at the latest eight years after, for the date of our Epistle. Still it is not impossible that both these expressions might be used. A time of great peril passed away might be thus alluded to, even at the distance of five or six years: and it might well be, that the majority of the Roman Jewish Christians had become converts during the immediately preceding imprisonment of St. Paul, and by his means.

32. On this supposition, still more light is thrown on this passage, and on the general tenor of the martyrology in the eleventh chapter.

Thus the great fight of afflictions is fully justified : thus, the being made a spectacle of in reproaches and tribulations, which finds almost an echo in the expression of Tacitus, that mockery was added to the sufferings of the dying Christians, and is so exactly in accord, when literally taken, with the cruel exposures and deaths in the circus. The prisoners and the spoiling too, on this supposition, would be matters of course. And I own, notwithstanding the objection stated above, that all this seems to fit the great Neronian persecution, and in the fullest sense, that only.

33. To that period also may we refer the notice in ch. xiii. 7 ; “ Remember your leaders, who spoke to you the word of God, of whom regarding the end of their conversation, imitate their faith.” It may be indeed, that this refers simply to a natural death in the faith of Christ : but it is far more probable, from the terms used, that it points to death by martyrdom : faith having been so strongly illustrated in ch. xi., as bearing up under torments and death.

34. On this hypothesis, several other matters seem also to fall into place. The setting at liberty of Timotheus may well refer to the termination of some imprisonment of Timotheus consequent upon the Neronian persecution, from which perhaps the death of the tyrant liberated him. Where this imprisonment took place, must be wholly uncertain. I shall speak of the conjectural probabilities of the place indicated by the words if he come shortly, when I come to treat of the time and place of writing<sup>1</sup>.

35. The use evidently made in our Epistle of the Epistle to the Romans, above all other of St. Paul’s<sup>2</sup>, will thus also be satisfactorily accounted for. Not only was the same church addressed, but the Writer had especially before him the matter and language of that Epistle, which was written in all probability from Corinth, the scene of the labours of Paul and Apollos.

36. The sort of semi-anonymous character of our Epistle, already treated of when we ascribed the authorship to Apollos, will also come in here, as singularly in accord with the circumstances of the case, and with the subsequent tradition as regards the Epistle, in case it was addressed to the church in Rome. Supposing, as we have gathered from the notices of Apollos in 1 Cor., that he modestly shrunk from being thought to put himself into rivalry with St. Paul, and that after the death of the Apostle he found it necessary to write such an Epistle as this to the Church in the metropolis, what more likely step would he take with regard to his own name and personality in it, than just that which we find has been taken: viz., so to conceal these, as to keep them from having any prominence, while by various minute personal notices he prevents the concealment from being complete? And with regard to the relation evidently subsisting between the Writer and his readers, all we can say is that, in defect of positive knowledge on this head connecting Apollos with the church at Rome, it is evidently in the metropolis, of all places, where such a relation may most safely be assumed. There a teacher, whose native place was Alexandria, and who had travelled to Ephesus and Corinth, was pretty sure to have been: there many of his Christian friends would be found: there alone, in the absence of positive testimony, could we venture to place such a cycle of dwelling and teaching, as would justify the expression, restored to you, of our ch. xiii. 19: in the place whither was a general confluence of all, and where there is ample room for such a course after the decease of St. Paul.

<sup>2</sup> This has been noticed by many ; and may be established by consulting those Commentators and writers, who have drawn up tables of verbal coincidence with a view of proving the Pauline authorship. There is reason for thinking that the peculiar form of the quotation, “ Vengeance is mine, I will repay,” in ch. x. 30, agreeing neither with the Hebrew text of Deut. xxxii. 35, nor with the Septuagint version there, is owing to its having been taken direct from Rom. xii. 19. And the whole form of exhortation in our ch. xiii. 1—6, reminds us forcibly of that in Rom. xii. 1—21. See also Rom. xiv. 17, as compared with Heb. xiii. 9, in § iv. par. 1, note.

37. And what more likely fate to befall the Epistle in this respect, than just that which did befall it in the Roman Church: viz., that while in that church, and by a contemporary of Apollos, Clement, we find the first use made of our Epistle, and that the most familiar and copious use,—its words are never formally cited, nor is any author's name attached? And was not this especially likely to be the case, as Clement was writing to the Corinthians, the very church where the danger had arisen of a rivalry between the fanctors of the two teachers?

38. And as time goes on, the evidence for this hypothesis seems to gather strength, in the nature of the traditions respecting the authorship of our Epistle. While in Africa and the East they are most various and inconsistent with one another, and the notion of a Pauline origin is soon suggested, and gains rapid acceptance, it is in the church of Rome alone, and among those influenced by her, that we find an ever steady and unvarying assertion, that it was not written by St. Paul. By whom it was written, none ventured to say. How weighty the reasons may have been, which induced silence on this point, we have now lost the power of appreciating. The fact only is important for us, that the few personal notices which occur in it were in course of time overborne, as indications of its author, by the prevalent anonymous character: and that the same church which possessed as its heritage the most illustrious of St. Paul's own epistles, was ever unanimous in disclaiming, on the part of the Apostle of the Gentiles, the authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

39. The result of the above enquiry may be shortly stated. As the current of popular opinion in the church has gradually set in towards the Pauline authorship, inferring that a document at first sight so Pauline must have proceeded from the Apostle himself: so has it also set in towards the church at Jerusalem as the original readers, inferring that the title, to the Hebrews, must be thus interpreted. But as in the one case, so in the other, the general popular opinion does not bear examination. As the phenomena of the Epistle do not bear out the idea of the Pauline authorship, so neither do they that of being addressed to the Palestine churches. And as in the other case there is one man, when we come to search and conjecture, pointed out as most likely to have written the Epistle, so here, when we pursue the same process, there is one place pointed out, to which it seems most likely to have been addressed. At Rome, such a Church existed as is indicated in it: at Rome, above all other places, its personal and historical notices are satisfied: at Rome, we find it first used: at Rome only, is there an unanimous and unvarying negative tradition regarding its authorship. To ROME then, until stronger evidence is adduced, we believe it to have been originally written.

SECTION III.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.

1. Almost all Commentators agree in believing that our Epistle was written before the destruction of Jerusalem. And rightly: for if that great break-up of the Jewish polity and religious worship had occurred, we may fairly infer, that some mention of such an event would have been found in an argument, the scope of which is to shew the transitoriness of the Jewish priesthood and the Levitical ceremonies. It would be inconceivable, that such an Epistle should be addressed to Jews after their city and temple had ceased to exist.

2. This then being assumed, as our later limit, i. e. A.D. 70, or at the latest assigned date, 72, it remains to seek for an earlier limit. Such would appear to me to be fixed by the death of St. Paul: but inasmuch as 1) this would not be recognized either by the advocates of the Pauline authorship, or by those who believe that the Epistle, though possibly written by another, was superintended by the Apostle, and seeing 2) that the date of that event itself is wholly uncertain, it will be necessary to look elsewhere for some indication. And the only traces of one will, I conceive, be found by combining several hints furnished by the Epistle. Such are, a) that the first generation, of those who had seen and heard the Lord, was at all events nearly passed away: b) that the first leaders of the church had died, probably under the persecution elsewhere alluded to: c) that Timotheus had been imprisoned, and was then set free, probably in connexion with that same persecution. If these notices are to be taken, as maintained above (§ ii. par. 31 ff.), to apply to the Neronian persecution, then the Epistle cannot have been written till some considerable time after that, in order to justify the expression, remember the former days, of our ch. x. 32. Now that persecution broke out in 64, and lasted four years, i.e. till Nero's death in 68. And I may notice, that even those who are far from adopting the views here advocated as to the Author and readers of the Epistle, yet consider, that the liberation of Timotheus may well have been connected with the cessation of the Neronian persecution.

3. If we follow these indications, we shall get the year 68 as our earlier limit, and the time of writing the Epistle will be 68—70, i.e. during the siege of Jerusalem by the armies of Titus, to which we may perhaps discern an allusion in ch. xiii. 14, for we have here no abiding city, but we seek one to come.

4. With regard to the place of writing, we are almost entirely in the dark. Taking the usual New Test. sense, above maintained, for those from Italy,—"persons whose home is in Italy, but who are now here,"—it cannot have been written in Italy. Nor is Apollos (for when we are left, as now, to the merest conjecture, it is necessary to shape our course by assuming our own hypothesis) likely, after what had happened, again to be found fixed at Corinth. Jerusalem, and indeed Palestine, would be precluded by the Jewish war then raging; Ephesus is possible, and would be a not unlikely resort of Timotheus after his liberation (ch. xiii. 23), as also of Apollos at any time (Acts xviii. 24): Alexandria, the native place of Apollos, is also possible, though the words if he come shortly, applied to Timotheus, would not so easily fit it, as on his liberation he would be more likely to go to some parts with which he was familiar than to Alexandria where he was a stranger. In both these cities there may well have been persons from Italy sojourning: and this very phrase seems to point to some place of considerable resort. On the whole then, I should incline to EPHESUS, as the most probable place of writing: but it must be remembered that on this head all is in the realm of the vaguest conjecture.

SECTION IV.

OCCASION, OBJECT OF WRITING, AND CONTENTS.

1. The occasion which prompted this Epistle evidently was, the enmity of the Jews to the Gospel of Christ, which had brought a double danger on the church : on the one hand that of persecution, on the other that of apostasy. Between these lay another, that of mingling with a certain recognition of Jesus as the Christ, a leaning to Jewish practices and valuing of Jewish ordinances. But this latter does not so much appear in our Epistle, as in those others which were written by St. Paul to mixed churches ; those to the Romans<sup>3</sup>, the Galatians, the Colossians. The principal peril to which Jewish converts were exposed, especially after they had lost the guidance of the Apostles themselves in their various churches, was, that of falling back from the despised following of Jesus of Nazareth into the more compact and apparently safer system of their childhood, which moreover they saw tolerated as a lawful religion, while their own was outcast and proscribed.

2. The object then of this Epistle is, to shew them the superiority of the Gospel to the former covenant : and that mainly by exhibiting, from the Scriptures, and from the nature of the case, the superiority of Jesus Himself to both the messengers and the High Priests of that former covenant. This is the main argument of the Epistle, filled out and illustrated by various corollaries springing out of its different parts, and expanding in the directions of encouragement, warning, and illustration.

3. This argument is entered on at once without introduction in ch. i., where Christ's superiority to the angels, the mediators of the old covenant, is demonstrated from Scripture. Then, having interposed (ii. 1—4) a caution on the greater necessity of taking heed to the things which they had heard, the Writer shews (ii. 5—18) why He to whom, and not to the angels, the future world is subjected, yet was made lower than the angels : viz. that He might become our merciful and faithful High Priest, to deliver and to save us, Himself having undergone temptation like ourselves.

4. Having mentioned this title of Christ, he goes back, and prepares the way for its fuller treatment, by a comparison of Him with Moses (iii. 1—6), and a shewing that that antitypical rest of God, from which unbelief excludes, was not the rest of the seventh day, nor that of the possession of Canaan, but one yet reserved for the people of God (iii. 7—iv. 10), into which we must all the more strive to enter, because the word of our God is keen and searching in judgment, and nothing hidden from His sight, with whom we have to do (iv. 11—13).

5. He now resumes the main consideration of his great subject, the

<sup>3</sup> One remarkable trace we have of allusion to this form of error,—in its further development, as appears by the verdict of past experience which is appended, but otherwise singularly resembling a passage in the Epistle to the Romans (xiv. 17), in our ch. xiii. 9, "For it is good that the heart be established with grace, not with meats, by which they were not profited who walked in them."

High Priesthood of Christ, with a hortatory note of passage (iv. 14—16). This subject he pursues through the whole middle portion of the Epistle (v. 1—x. 18), treating it in its various aspects and requirements. Of these we have (v. 1—10) the conditions of High Priesthood: (v. 11—vi. 20) a digression complaining, with reference to the difficult subject of the Melchisedek-priesthood, of their low state of spiritual attainment, warning them of the necessity of progress, but encouraging them by God's faithfulness: (vii. 1—x. 18) the priesthood of Christ after the order of Melchisedek, in its distinction from the Levitical priesthood (see the various steps set forth in the headings in the commentary), as perpetual,—as superior, in that Abraham acknowledged himself inferior to Melchisedek,—as having power of endless life,—as constituted with an oath,—as living for ever,—as without sin,—as belonging to the heavenly sanctuary, and to a covenant promised by God Himself:—as consisting in better ministrations, able to purify the conscience itself, and to put away sin by the one Sacrifice of the Son of God.

6. Having thus completed his main argument, he devotes the concluding portion (x. 19—xiii. 25) to a series of solemn exhortations to endurance in confidence and patience, and illustrations of that faith, on which both must be founded. In x. 19—39, we have exhortation and warning deduced from the facts lately proved, our access to the heavenly place, and our having a great High Priest over the house of God: then by the Pauline citation the (or, my) just man shall live by faith, a transition note is struck to ch. xi. which entirely consists in a panegyric of faith and a recounting of its triumphs: on a review of which the exhortation to run the race set before us, and endure chastisement, is again taken up, ch. xii. And the same hortatory strain is pursued to the end of the Epistle; the glorious privileges of the Christian covenant being held forth, and the awful peril of forfeiting them by apostasy;—and those graces, and active virtues, and that steadfastness in suffering shame, being enjoined, which are necessary to the following and imitation of Jesus Christ. The valedictory prayer (xiii. 20, 21), and one or two personal notices and greetings, conclude the whole.

SECTION V.

LANGUAGE AND STYLE.

1. Something has already been said, in the previous enquiry into the authorship of our Epistle, respecting the question of its original language<sup>4</sup>. There also the principal passages of the Fathers will be found which bear on this subject. They may be thus briefly summed up:

2. The idea of a Hebrew original is found in Clement of Alexandria (cited above, § i. par. 14), in Eusebius (ib. par. 48), Jerome, Theodoret, Euthalius (above, § i. par. 46), Primasius, John Damascenus, Œcumenius, Theophylact,—in Cosmas Indicopleustes,—in Rhabanus Maurus,—in Thomas Aquinas; in some modern writers, especially Hallet, in an enquiry into the author and language of the Epistle, appended to Peirce's Commentary (1742), and Michaelis.

3. Still such an apparently formidable array of ancient testimony is not to be taken as such, without some consideration. Clement's assertion of a Hebrew original is not reproduced by his scholar Origen, but on the contrary a Greek original is presupposed by his very words (above, § i. par. 19). And this his divergence from Clement of Alexandria is not easy to explain, if he had regarded him as giving matter of history, and not rather a conjecture of his own. Indeed, the passage of Clement seems to bear this latter on the face of it: for it connects the similarity of style between this Epistle and the Acts with the notion of St. Luke being its translator. If we might venture to fill up the steps by which the inference came about, they would be nearly these: "The Epistle must be St. Paul's. But St. Paul was a Hebrew, and was writing to Hebrews: how then do we find the Epistle in Greek, not unlike in style to that of the Acts of the Apostles? What, if the writer of the Greek of that book were also the writer of the Greek of this,—and St. Paul, as was to be supposed, wrote as a Hebrew to the Hebrews, in Hebrew, St. Luke translating into Greek?"

4. Again, Eusebius is not consistent in this matter with himself. In another place he clearly implies that the Epistle was written in Greek. And such has been the opinion of almost all the moderns: of all, we may safely say, who have handled the subject impartially and intelligently. The reasons for this now generally received opinion are mainly found in the style of the Epistle, which is the most purely Greek of all the writings of the New Test.: so that it would be violating all probability to imagine it a translation from a language of entirely different rhetorical character. The construction of the periods is such, in distinction from the character, in this particular, of the Oriental languages, that if it is a translation, the whole argumentation of the original must have been broken up into its original elements of thought, and all its connecting links recast; so that it would not be so much a translation, as a re-writing, of the Hebrew Epistle.

5. The plays on words again, and the citations from the Septuagint version being made in entire independence of the Hebrew text, form collectively a presumptive proof, the weight of which it is very difficult to evade, that the present Greek text is the original. Such peculiarities belong to thought running free and selecting its own words, not to the constrained reproduction of the thoughts of another in another tongue.

If our English version be examined in any of those numerous places where St. Paul has indulged in plays on words, no such will be found in the translation. And yet English is much nearer to Greek than Greek to any dialect of the Hebrew.

6, 7. Other arguments, which can hardly be appreciated by the English reader, will be found in this place in my Greek Testament.

8. These considerations, coming in aid of the conviction which must be felt by every intelligent Greek scholar that he is reading an original composition and not a version, induce us to refuse the idea of a Hebrew original, and to believe the Epistle to have been first written in Greek.

9. The style of our Epistle has been already touched upon in our enquiry respecting the authorship, § i. parr. 116 ff. From the earliest times, its diversity from that of the writings of St. Paul has been matter of remark. It is a nearer approach to classical Greek. The main difference for us, which will also set forth its characteristic peculiarity, is, that whereas St. Paul is ever as it were struggling with the scantiness of human speech to pour forth his crowding thoughts, thereby falling into rhetorical and grammatical irregularities, the style of our Epistle flows regularly on, with no such suspended constructions. Even where the subject induces long parentheses, the Writer does not break the even flow and equilibrium of his style, but returns back to the point where he left it.

10. Again, the greatest pains are bestowed on a matter which does not seem to have engaged the attention of the other sacred writers, even including St. Paul himself: viz. rhetorical rhythm, and equilibrium of words and sentences. In St. Paul's most glorious outbursts of eloquence, he is not rhetorical. In those of the Writer of our Epistle, he is elaborately and faultlessly rhetorical. The particles and participles used are all weighed with a view to this effect. The simple expressions of the other sacred writers are expanded into longer words, or into sonorous and majestic clauses.

SECTION VI.

CANONICITY.

1. This part of our introduction must obviously be treated quite irrespective of the hypothesis of the Pauline authorship of the Epistle. That being assumed, its canonicity follows. That being denied, our object must be to shew how the Epistle itself was regarded, even by those who were not persuaded of its apostolicity.

2. The earliest testimonies to it are found where we might expect them, in the Church of Rome, and in the writings of one who never cites it as apostolic. It will be important for us to see, in what estimation Clement held it. He makes, as we have already seen, the most frequent and copious use of it, never citing it expressly, never appealing to it as Scripture, but adopting its words and expressions, just as he does those of other books of the New Testament. It is to be observed, that when in the course of thus incorporating it he refers to the Scripture, or uses the expression it is written, it is with regard to texts quoted not from it only, but also from the Old Test. By this procedure we cannot say that Clement casts any slight on this Epistle, for it is his constant practice. He frequently quotes Scripture as such, but it is always the Old Test. Two or three times he adduces the sayings of our Lord, but never even this in the form of a citation from our existing gospels, or in agreement with their exact words. All we can gather from Clement is, that, treating this as he does other Epistles<sup>5</sup>, and appropriating largely as he does its words and expressions, he certainly did not rank it below those others: an inference which would lead us to believe that he recognized its canonical authority. But to found more than this on Clement's testimony, would be unwarranted by fair induction.

3. Justin Martyr, amidst a few allusions to our Epistle, makes what can hardly but be called canonical use of it in his first Apology. There, in explaining that the Word of God is also His Son, he adds, "Moreover, He is called Angel and Apostle." Now it appears from his own statement in another place, that the allusion in the words, "He is called an angel," is to Gen. xviii. 2. It would seem therefore, seeing that Heb. iii. 1 is the only place where our Lord is entitled an apostle, that the clause meant to embrace under it that passage as a Scripture testimony equipollent with the other.

4. In Clement of Alexandria and Origen, the recognition of our Epistle as canonical depends on its recognition as the work of St. Paul. Where they both cite it as Scripture, it is as written by him: and where Origen mentions the doubt about its being his, he adduces other Scripture testimony, observing that it needs another kind of proof, not that the Epistle is canonical, but that it is St. Paul's.

5. And very similar was the proceeding of those parts of the church where the Pauline authorship was not held. Irenæus, as we have seen, makes no use of the Epistle. The fragment of Muratori, representing the view of the Roman church, probably does not contain it. Tertullian, who regards it as written by Barnabas, the "companion of the Apostles," cites it, not as authoritative in itself, but as recording the sentiments of such a companion of the Apostles.

6. Our Epistle is, it is true, contained in the Syriac version (Peshito) made at the end of the second century: but it is entirely uncertain, whether this insertion in the canon accompanied a recognition of the Pauline authorship, or not. This recognition, which prevailed in that part of the church in after times, may have at first occasioned its insertion in the canon ; but we cannot say that it did.

7. But in the Alexandrine Church the case was different. There, as we have seen, the assumption of Pauline authorship appears early and soon prevails universally : and in consequence we find the canonical authority there unquestioned, and the Epistle treated as the other parts of Scripture.

8. Throughout the Eastern Churches, the canonicity and apostolicity were similarly regarded as inseparably connected. It is true that Eusebius, in numbering it among the controverted books, together with the Epistles of Barnabas and Clement and Jude, and the Wisdom of the Son of Sirach, might seem to attribute to it another authorship, were it not evident from his constant use of it, and his numbering it in his principal passage on the Canon among the acknowledged books, that the doubt must be resolved into that on the Pauline authorship.

9. In the Western Church, where this was not recognized, neither do we find, even down to the middle of the fourth century, any use made of the Epistle as canonical. Even Novatian and Cyprian, who might well have thus used it, have not done so : nor in the controversies on the reception of the lapsed, and on the repetition of heretical baptism, do we ever find it adduced on either side, apposite as some passages are to the subjects in dispute. Only with the assumption, gradually imported from the East, of a Pauline origin, do we find here and there a Western writer citing it as of canonical authority.

10. It is in Jerome first that we find<sup>6</sup> any indication of a doubt whether canonicity and Pauline authorship are necessarily to stand and fall together. The same is found<sup>7</sup> now and then in the writings of Augustine. But soon after this time the general prevalence, and ultimately authoritative sanction, of the view of the Pauline authorship, closed up any chance of the canonicity of the Epistle being held on independent grounds : and it was not till the times of the Reformation, that the matter began to be again enquired into on its own merits.

11. The canonicity was doubted by Cardinal Cajetan, but upheld by Erasmus, in these remarkable words : "Nay, I cannot think that our faith is in peril, if the whole Church is at fault in the title of this Epistle, if only it be acknowledged that the Holy Spirit was the primary Author, which is commonly held by all." In the Roman Catholic Church, however, the authoritative sanction given by the Council of Trent to the belief of the Pauline origin effectually stopped all intelligent enquiry.

12. Among reformed theologians, the canonicity of our Epistle was strongly upheld, even when the Pauline authorship was not recognized. Calvin says, in his prologue to the Epistle,—“I embrace it without controversy as among the apostolical writings, and doubt not that it arose in former days from the artifice of Satan that some detracted from its authority. For there is none of the sacred books that treats so clearly of Christ’s priesthood, so gloriously extols the force and dignity of the one sacrifice which He offered by His Death, treats so copiously of the use and abrogation of ceremonies, and in a word more fully explains Christ as the end of the law. Wherefore let us not suffer the Church of God and ourselves to be spoiled of such a treasure, but constantly claim its possession. Who composed it, is not much worth caring about.”

13. Beza speaks in the same strain: “What is the use of contending about the author’s name, which he himself wished to conceal? Let it suffice to know this, that it was truly dictated by the Holy Spirit, &c.”

14. Similarly also the Gallican Confession, which, though it divides it off from the Pauline writings, yet includes it without remark among the canonical books. So also the Arminians, e. g. Limboreh, who, believing it to have been written by one of the companions of Paul, with Paul’s knowledge, acknowledges its divine authority, and even prefers it to many of the Apostle’s own writings.

15. Among the early Lutheran divines there were some differences of opinion respecting the place to be assigned to the Epistle; the general view being, that it was to be read, as Jerome first wrote of the Apocryphal Old Test. books, for the edification of the people, but not for the confirmation of ecclesiastical doctrines. In other words, it was set apart,—and in this relegation six other books shared, 2 Pet., 2 and 3 John, James, Jude, and the Apocalypse,—among the Apocryphal writings appended to the New Test. And this order was usually followed in the German Bibles.

16. Soon however after the beginning of the 17th century, this distinction began to be obliterated, and the practice to be introduced of calling these books deutero-canonical, i. e. canonical in the second rank, and, although thus called, of citing them as of equal authority, and equally inspired, with the other books. Since that time, the controversies respecting the books of Scripture have taken a wider range, and it has not been so much respecting canonicity, as respecting origin, character, and doctrine, that the disputes of divines have been waged.

17. In our own country, at the time of the Reformation, while the question of authorship was left open, the canonical authority of the Epistle was never doubted. To establish this, it may be enough to cite some testimonies.

In Tyndale’s prologue to the Epistle, he says, having mentioned the objection to the Pauline authorship from ch. ii. 3,

"Now whether it were Paul's or no, I say not, but permit it to other men's judgments : neither think I it to be an article of any man's faith, but that a man may doubt of the author." Then, having met several objections against its canonicity urged from certain texts in it, as ch. vi. 4 ff., ch. x. 26 ff., ch. xii. 17, he concludes, "Of this ye see that this Epistle ought no more to be refused for a holy, godly, and catholic, than the other authentic Scriptures." And, speaking of the Writer, he says, "It is easy to see that he was a faithful servant of Christ, and of the same doctrine that Timothy was of, yea and Paul himself was of, and that he was an Apostle, or in the Apostles' time, or near thereunto. And seeing the Epistle agreeth to all the rest of the Scripture, if it be indifferently looked on, why should it not be authority, and taken for holy Scripture?"

18. Fulke, in his defence of Translations of the Bible<sup>9</sup>, while defending the omission of the name of St. Paul in the title of the Epistle in the Geneva Bible of 1560, says, "Which of us, I pray you, that thinketh that this Epistle was not written by St. Paul, once doubteth whether it be not of apostolical spirit and authority? Which is manifest by this, that both in preaching and writing we cite it thus, the Apostle to the Hebrews."

19. Bp. Jewel again, in his Defence of the Apology, p. 186, where he is speaking of the charge of anonymousness brought against it, says, "The Epistle unto the Hebrews, some say, was written by St. Paul, some by Clemens, some by Barnabas, some by some other: and so are we uncertain of the author's name."

20. Whittaker says, "Thus, then, we doubt not of the authority of any book of the New Testament, nor indeed of the author of any, save only the Epistle to the Hebrews. That this Epistle is canonical, all concede in the fullest sense: but it is not equally clear that it was written by the Apostle Paul. . . . We need not be very earnest in this debate; it is not a matter of necessity, and the question may very well be left in doubt, provided that, in the mean while, the authority of the Epistle be allowed to remain clear and uncontested<sup>10</sup>."

21. With regard to the question itself, in what light we are to look on our Epistle with respect to canonicity, it is one which it will be well to treat here on general grounds, as it will come before us again more than once, in writing of the remaining books of the New Test.

22. We might put this matter on the ground which Jerome takes in his Epistle to Dardanus, "It makes no matter whose it is, for it is plainly the work of a catholic (ecclesiastical) author:" or on that which Erasmus takes, when he says that the "primary Author" is the Holy Spirit, and so puts by as indifferent the question of the secondary author: thus in both cases resting the decision entirely on the character of the contents of the book itself.

23. But this would manifestly be a wrong method of proceeding. We do not thus in the case of other writings, whose unexceptionable evangelic character is universally acknowledged. To say nothing of later productions, no one ever reasoned thus respecting the Epistle of Barnabas, or that of Clement to the Corinthians, or any of the quasi-apostolic writings. None of the ancients ever dealt so before Jerome, nor did Jerome himself in other passages. More than intrinsic excellence and orthodoxy is wanting, to win for a book a place in the New Test. canon. Indeed any reasoning must be not only in itself insufficient, but logically unsound, which makes the authority of a book which is to set us our standard of doctrine, the result of a judgment of our own respecting the doctrine inculcated in it. Such judgment can be only subsidiary to the enquiry, not the primary line of its argument, which must of necessity be of an objective character.

24. And when we come to proofs of this latter kind, it may well be asked, which of them we are to accept as sufficient. It is clear, we cannot appeal to tradition alone. We must combine with such an appeal, the exercise of our own judgment on tradition. When, for example, the Church of England takes, in her sixth article, the ground of pure tradition, and says, "In the name of the Holy Scripture, we do understand those canonical books of the Old and New Testament, of whose authority was never any doubt in the Church," she would by implication, if consistent with herself, exclude from the Canon at the least the Apocalypse, which was for some centuries not received by the Eastern and for the most part by the Greek church, and our Epistle, which was for some centuries not received by the whole Latin church. Nay, she would go even further than this: for even to the present day the Syrian church excludes the Apocalypse, the Epistles of St. Jude, 2 and 3 John, and 2 Peter, from the Canon. It is fortunate that our Church did not leave this definition to be worked out for itself, but, giving a detailed list of Old Test. books, has appended to it this far more definite sentence: "All the books of the New Testament, as they are commonly received, we do receive, and account them Canonical:" thus adopting the list of New Test. books in common usage in the Western Church at the time, about which there could be no difference.

25. If then tradition pure and simple will not suffice for our guide, how are we to combine our judgment with it, so as to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion? It is manifest, that the question of origin comes in here as most important. If the genuineness of a book be in dispute, as e.g. that of 2 Peter, it suffices to make it reasonably probable that it was written by him whose name it bears. When this is received, all question of canonicity is at rest. In that case, the name of the Apostle is ample guarantee. And so with our Epistle, those who think they can prove it to be the work of St. Paul, are no longer troubled about its canonicity. This is secured, in shewing it to be of apostolic origin.

26. And so it ever was in the early Church. Apostolicity and Canonicity were bound together. And in the case of those historical books which were not written by apostles themselves, there was ever an effort to connect their writers, St. Mark with St. Peter, St. Luke with St. Paul, so that at least apostolic sanction might not be wanting to them. What then must be our course with regard to a book, of which we believe neither that it was written by an Apostle, nor that it had apostolic sanction?

27. This question must necessarily lead to an answer not partaking of that rigid demonstrative character which some reasoners require for all inferences regarding the authority of Scripture. Our conclusion must be matter of moral evidence, and of degree: must be cumulative, —made up of elements which are not, taken by themselves, decisive, but which, taken together, are sufficient to convince the reasonable mind.

28. First, we have reason to believe that our Epistle was written by one who lived and worked in close union with the Apostle Paul: of whom that Apostle says that he “planted, and Apollos watered, and God gave the increase:” of whom it is elsewhere in holy writ declared, that he was “an eloquent man and mighty in the Scriptures:” that he “helped much them which had believed through grace:” that he “mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, shewing by the Scriptures that Jesus was Christ.”

29. Secondly, having, as we believe, from his pen such an Epistle, we find it largely quoted by one who was himself a companion of the Apostles,—and almost without question appealed to as Scripture by another primitive Christian writer: and both these testimonies belong to that very early age of the Church, when controversies about canonicity had not yet begun.

30. Thirdly, in the subsequent history of the Church, we find the reception of the Epistle into the Canon becoming ever more and more a matter of common consent: mainly, no doubt, in connexion with the hypothesis of its Pauline authorship, but, as we have shewn above, not in all cases in that connexion.

31. Fourthly, we cannot refuse the conviction, that the contents of the Epistle itself are such, as powerfully to come in aid of these other considerations. Unavailing as such a conviction would be of itself, as has been previously noticed, yet it is no small confirmation of the evidence which probable authorship, early recognition, and subsequent consent, furnish to the canonicity of our Epistle, when we find that nowhere are the main doctrines of the faith more purely or more majestically set forth: nowhere Holy Scripture urged with greater authority and cogency; nowhere those marks in short, which distinguish the first rank of primitive Christian writings from the second, more unequivocally and continuously present.

32. The result of this combination of evidence is, that though no considerations of expediency, nor consent of later centuries, can ever make us believe the Epistle to have been written by St. Paul, we yet conceive ourselves perfectly justified in accounting it a portion of the New Test. canon, and in regarding it with the same reverence as the rest of the Holy Scriptures.

There are other subjects of deep interest connected with our Epistle, such as its relation, in point of various aspects of Christian doctrine, to the teaching of St. Paul, of St. John, of St. James, and of St. Peter: its connexion with, and independence of, the system of Philo: to treat of which would extend this introduction, already long, to the size of a volume. They will be found discussed in the first part of Riehm's "Lehrbegriff des Hebraerbriefes," Ludwigsburg, 1858.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE GENERAL EPISTLE OF JAMES.

ITS AUTHORSHIP.

1. It has been very generally agreed, that among the apostolic persons bearing the name of James (Jacobus), the son of Zebedee, the brother of St. John, cannot well have written our Epistle. The state of things and doctrines which we find in it can hardly have been reached as early as before the execution of that Apostle, related in Acts xii.

2. But when we have agreed on this, matter of controversy at once arises. It would appear from the simple superscription of our Epistle with the name Jacobus, that we are to recognize in its Writer the apostolic person known simply by this name in the Acts,—who was the president of the church at Jerusalem (Acts xii. 17; xv. 13 ff.; xxi. 18), and is called by St. Paul the brother of our Lord (Gal. i. 19). This also being pretty generally granted, the question arising is: Was this James identical with, or was he distinct from, James the son of Alphæus, one of the Twelve apostles (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13)?

3. I have partly anticipated the answer to this question in my note on Matt. xiii. 55, where I have maintained that, consistently with the straightforward acceptation of Scripture data, we cannot believe any of those who are called the brethren of our Lord to have been also of the number of the Twelve. I conceive John vii. 5, as compared with ib. vi. 67, 70 immediately preceding, to be decisive on this point; and since I first expressed myself thus, I have seen nothing in the least degree calculated to shake that conviction<sup>1</sup>. And, that conclusion still standing, I must of course believe this James to be excluded from the number of the Twelve, and if so, distinct from the son of Alphæus.

4. Still, it will be well to deal with the question on its own ground. And first, as to the notices in Scripture itself which bear on it. And these, it must be acknowledged, are not without difficulty. As, e. g., those which occur in St. Luke, who must have been well aware of the state of matters in the church at Jerusalem. He names, up to Acts xii., but two persons as James: one, whom he always couples with John (Luke v. 10; vi. 14; viii. 51; ix. 28, 54 [Acts i. 13]), and in Acts xii. 2 relates, under the name of "the brother of John," to have been slain with the sword by Herod: the other, whom he twice introduces as "Jacobus (James) the (son) of Alphæus" (Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13). Besides, in accordance with the usage of the Greek idiom, the genitive of the name, "of Jacobus" (James), is thrice mentioned by him as designating by relationship other persons: in Luke vi. 16; Acts i. 13, we read of Judas the (brother?) of Jacobus (James), and in Luke xxiv. 10, of Mary the (mother?) of Jacobus (James): interpreting which latter expression by Matt. xxvii. 56; Mark xv. 40, 47, and xvi. 1, and by John xix. 25, we shall infer that the Mary here mentioned being the wife of Alphæus (or Clopas), the ellipsis must be filled up by the word mother, and "Jacobus" (James) in this place designates James the son of Alphæus. And as regards "Judas the (brother?) of Jacobus" (James), we may well suppose that the same person is designated by the genitive, however difficult it may be to fill in the ellipsis. We have a Judas, who designates himself "the brother of Jacobus" (James), Jude 1: but whether these are to be considered identical, must be determined by the result of our present investigation.

5. The question for us with regard to St. Luke, is the following: In Acts xii. 17, and in the subsequent parts of that book, we have a person mentioned simply as "Jacobus" (James), who is evidently of great authority in the church at Jerusalem. Are we to suppose that St. Luke, careful and accurate as his researches were, was likely to have introduced thus without previous notice, a new and third person bearing the same name? Does not this testify strongly for the identity of the two?

6. The best way to answer this question will be, to notice St. Luke's method of proceeding on an occasion somewhat analogous. In Acts i. 13, we find "Philip" among the Apostles. In ib. vi. 5, we find a "Philip" among the seven, appointed to relieve the Apostles from the daily ministration of alms. In ib. viii. 5, we read that "Philip" went down to a city of Samaria and preached. Now as there is nothing to identify this part of the narrative with what went before, or to imply that this was not a missionary journey of one of the Apostles, distinct from the dispersion from which they were excepted above, ver. 1, it is not at the first moment obvious which Philip is meant. It is true, that intelligent comparison of the parts of the narrative makes it plain to us: but the case is one in point, as shewing, that St. Luke is in the habit of leaving it to such comparison to decide, and not of inserting notices at the mention of names, to prevent mistake. This would be much more in the practice of St. John, who writes, xiv. 22, "Judas, not Iscariot:" see also xi. 2. It seems then that the practice of St. Luke will not decide for us, but our enquiry must still be founded on the merits of the question itself.

7. And in so doing, we will make first the hypothesis of the identity of James the son of Alphæus with James the Lord's brother. Then, besides the great, and to me insuperable difficulty in John vi. 70, vii. 5, we shall have the following circumstances for our consideration: 1) In Matt. xxvii. 56, and Mark xv. 40, we read of Mary the mother of James and Josès: and in Mark, the epithet "the small" or "less" is attached to "Jacobus" (James). Now on the hypothesis of James, the brother of the Lord, being identical with the son of Alphæus, there were four such sons, Matt. xiii. 55; James, Joseph, Simon, and Judas: and of these four, two, James and Judas, were Apostles. So that, leaving out of the question for the moment the confusion of the names Josès and

Joseph, we should thus have Mary the wife of Clopas designated as the mother of James, who was an apostle, and of Joses, who was not an apostle, to the exclusion of her son Judas, who was also an apostle. Is not this, to say the least, extremely improbable?

8. And besides this, let us review for a moment the epithet "the small," attached to "Jacobus" (James) by St. Mark. Beyond question, at the time when this Gospel was written, James the son of Zebedee had long ago fallen by the sword of Herod<sup>2</sup>. And as certainly, at this time James the Lord's brother was at the head of the mother church at Jerusalem, one of the three pillars (Gal. ii. 9) of the Christian body. Was it likely that at such a time (for the notice and epithet is one whose use must be sought at the time of the publication of the Gospel, not at that of the formation of the apostolic oral history, seeing that it does not occur in the parallel place in Matthew) the epithet "the small" would be attached to this James by way of distinguishing him from that other, long since martyred? Is it not much more probable that the epithet, for whatever reason, was attached to James the son of Alphæus to distinguish him from this very James the brother of the Lord?

9. If James the son of Alphæus, the Apostle, were the head of the mother church at Jerusalem, and a man of such distinction among the Jewish Christians, how comes it, that when an Apostle of the circumcision is to be named, over against St. Paul, St. Peter, and not he, is dignified by that title?

10. There is another more general consideration, which, however much it may be disallowed by some, yet seems to me not without weight. It hardly consists with the mission of the Twelve, that any of them should be settled in a particular spot, as the president or Bishop of a local church. Even granting the exceptional character of the Jerusalem church, it does not seem likely that the chief presbyter there would be one of those to whom it was said, "Go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature:" and of whom all that we read in the Acts of the Apostles, and all that primitive tradition relates to us, assures us that they fulfilled this command.

11. If we compare this hypothesis with early tradition, its first notices present us with a difficulty. Speaking of James the brother of the Lord, Eusebius quotes Hegesippus, an immediate successor of the Apostles, as saying that "James, the brother of the Lord, succeeded to the church of Jerusalem with the Apostles, and was of all men named the Just from the Lord's time even to our own; for there were many who bore this name of James."

12. This passage seems most plainly to preclude all idea of James the Lord's brother being one of the Twelve. However we understand the not very perspicuous words "with the Apostles;" whether we boldly suppose with Jerome, on account of the verb "succeeded to," that they are a mistake for "after the Apostles," or take them as they stand, and as is most likely from comparison with St. Paul's narrative in Gal. ii.,—of joint superintendence with the Apostles; on either, or any view, they expressly exclude James from the number of the Apostles themselves.

13. And entirely consistent with this is the frequently misunderstood other testimony from Hegesippus, cited by Eusebius: the straightforward interpretation of which passage is, that "after James the Just had been martyred, as was the Lord also for the same cause, next was appointed bishop Symeon, the son of Clopas, the offspring of his (James's, not the Lord's, as Lange and others have most unfairly attempted to make it mean) uncle, whom all agreed in preferring, being, as he was, second of the cousins of the Lord." That is, Joseph and Clopas (Alphæus) being brothers, and one son of Alphæus, James, being an Apostle, his next brother Symeon (Josès may have been dead ere this) being thus "second of the cousins of our Lord," and born of his (James's) uncle, succeeded James the Just in the bishopric of Jerusalem. I submit that on the hypothesis of Symeon being James's own brother, such a sentence is simply unaccountable.

14. It is true that in this, as in so many other matters, ancient tradition is not consistent with itself. For Euseb., H. E. ii. 1, quotes from Clement of Alexandria, "The Lord delivered the (traditional) knowledge to James the Just and John and Peter after the Resurrection. These delivered it to the other Apostles: and the rest of the Apostles to the Seventy, of whom was also Barnabas. Now there were two named James, one the Just, who was thrown from the pinnacle, and struck to death by a fuller with his club, and the other the one who was beheaded." And in the same chapter he speaks of Clement as reporting that Stephen was the first martyr, "and then James, who was called the brother of the Lord, whom men of old called the Just, first bishop of Jerusalem."

15. Compare with this Eusebius: "And then they say He appeared to James, who was one of those commonly reputed disciples of the Lord, yea, and His brothers:" and the Apostolical Constitutions, where after the enumeration of the Twelve Apostles, we have named "James the brother of the Lord and bishop of Jerusalem, and Paul the teacher of the Gentiles." Thus it appears, that the assumption of the identity encounters several difficulties, both from Scripture itself (even supposing the crowning one of John vii. 5 got over), and from primitive tradition. It nevertheless became very prevalent, as soon as the setting in of asceticism suggested the hypothesis of the perpetual virginity of the Mother of our Lord. This is found from Jerome downwards; and all kinds of artificial explanations of the relationship of the brethren to our Lord have been given, to escape the inference from the simple testimony of Holy Scripture, that they were veritably children of Joseph and Mary, younger than our Lord.

16. Let us now follow the other hypothesis, that James the brother of the Lord and James the son of Alphæus were different persons. Against this many objections have been brought, the principal of which seems to be, that thus we have so considerable a repetition of names among the family and disciples of our Lord. But this cannot on any hypothesis be got rid of. The undoubted facts of the Gospel history give us the following repetitions of names: a) we have under the name SIMON, 1) Simon Peter: 2) Simon the Cananæan or Zelotes, the Apostle: 3) Simon, the brother of the Lord, Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3: 4) Simon, the father of Judas Iscariot, John vi. 71 and elsewhere: 5) Simon the leper, in Bethany, Matt. xxvi. 6; Mark xiv. 3: 6) Simon of Cyrene, who bore the cross after our Lord, Matt. xxvii. 32 and parallels: 7) Simon Magnus: 8) Simon the tanner: besides 9) Simon the Pharisee, in whose house our Lord was anointed by the woman who was a sinner, Luke vii. 40.

b) Under the name JUDAS, 1) Judas Lebbæus or "of James," the Apostle: 2) (?) Judas, the brother of the Lord: 3) Judas Iscariot: 4) Judas Barsabas, Acts xv. 22: if not also 5) the Apostle Thomas, "the twin" ("Thomas who was also called Judas," Eusebins), so called by way of distinction from the two other Judases among the Twelve.

c) Under the name MARY, 1) the Mother of our Lord: 2) the mother of James and Joses, Matt. xxvii. 56: 3) Mary Magdalene: 4) Mary, the sister of Lazarus: 5) Mary, the mother of John Mark.

17. Besides these, we have d) at least four under the name JOSEPH, viz. 1) the reputed father of our Lord: 2) Joseph of Arimathea: 3) Joseph Barnabas, Acts iv. 36: 4) Joseph Barsabas, Acts i. 23: if not two more, a brother of our Lord, Matt. xiii. 55, and according to some MSS., a son of Mary and brother of James, Matt. xxvii. 56.

This being so, it really is somewhat out of place to cry out upon the supposed multiplication of persons bearing the same name in the New Testament.

18. The improbability of there being in each family, that of Joseph and that of Alphæus (Clopas), two sets of four brothers bearing the same names, is created by assuming the supplement of "Judas of James," Luke vi. 16; Acts i. 13, to be "brother," which, to say the least, is not necessary. The sons of Alphæus (except Levi [Matthew] who appears to have been the son of another Alphæus, but has been most unaccountably omitted from all consideration by those who object to the multiplication of those bearing the same name) are but two, James the less the Apostle, and Joses. We have not the least trace in Scripture, or even in tradition rightly understood, indicating that Simon Zelotes was a son of Alphæus. What is the improbability, in two brethren of our Lord bearing the same names as two of their cousins? Cannot almost every widely-spread family even among ourselves, where names are not so frequently repeated, furnish examples of the same and like coincidences?

19. No safe objection can be brought against the present hypothesis from St. Paul's words, "Other of the apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother," Gal. i. 19. For 1) the usage of the word "apostle" by St. Paul is not confined to the Twelve, and Christian antiquity recognized in Paul himself and this very James, two supplementary Apostles besides the Twelve<sup>3</sup>; and 2) it has been shewn by Fritzsehe, Neander, and Winer, and must be evident to any one accustomed to the usage of "some" or "except" in the New Test., that it need not necessarily qualify "other" here, but may just as well refer to the whole preceding clause.

20. The objection of Lange that it is impossible to imagine the growth of an apocryphal Apostleship, by the side of that founded by our Lord, entirely vanishes under a right view of the circumstances of the case. There would be no possibility, on Lange's postulates, of including St. Paul himself among the Apostles. There was nothing in the divine proceeding towards him, which indicated that he was to bear that name: still less was there any thing designating Barnabas as another apostle, properly so called. These two, on account of their importance and usefulness in the apostolic work, were received among the apostles as of apostolic dignity. Why may the same not have been the case, with a person so universally noted for holiness and justice as James the brother of the Lord?

21. Again, Lange objects, that "real Apostles thus altogether vanish from the field of action, and are superseded by other Apostles introduced afterwards." I would simply ask, what can be a more accurate description, than these words furnish, of the character of the history of the book which is entitled the Acts of the Apostles? Is it not, in the main, the record of the journeyings and acts of a later introduced Apostle, before whom the work of the other Apostles is cast into the shade? Besides, what do we know of the actions of any of the Apostles, except (taking even Lange's hypothesis) of Peter, James, John, and James the son of Alphæus? Where shall we seek any record of the doings of St. Matthew, St. Thomas, St. Philip, St. Jude, St. Bartholomew, St. Andrew, St. Simon, St. Matthias? In Acts xv. 22, a certain Judas appears as a "man of note," or "a leading person among the brethren:" but he is not St. Jude the Apostle. In Acts viii. we hear much of the missionary work of Philip: but he is not St. Philip the Apostle.

22. It seems to me from the above considerations, far the more probable inference from Scriptural and traditional data, that James the brother of the Lord, the Bishop of Jerusalem, the presumed Author of our Epistle, was distinct from James the son of Alphæus, one of the Twelve Apostles. And assuming this, I shall now gather up the notices which we find of this remarkable person.

23. It is certain, from John vii. 3—5, that he was not a believer in the Messiahship of Jesus at the period of His ministry there indicated. And from our Lord, when on the Cross, commending His mother to the care of St. John, the son of Zebedee, and probably His cousin after the flesh, we may infer that neither then did his brethren believe on Him. It would appear, however, from our finding them expressly mentioned in Acts i. 13, as assembled in the upper room with the Apostles and with the Mother of our Lord, and the believing women, that they were then believers, having probably been, from a half-persuaded and wavering faith, fixed, by the great events of the Passion and Resurrection, in a conviction of the divine mission of Jesus.

24. And of these the Lord's brethren, let us now fix our attention on JAMES, who seems, from his being placed first in the enumeration, Matt. xiii. 55 and the parallel place in Mark, to have been the eldest among them.

25. The character which we have of him, as a just and holy man, must in all probability be dated from before his conversion. And those who believe him to have been not by adoption only, but by actual birth a son of our Lord's parents, will trace in the appellation of him as "the Just," the character of his father (Matt. i. 19), and the humble faith and obedience of his mother (Luke i. 38). That the members of such a family should have grown up just and holy men, is the result which might be hoped from the teaching of such parents, and above all from the presence ever among them of the spotless and bright example of Him, of whom his cousin according to the flesh, yet not knowing Him to be the Messiah, could say, "I have need to be baptized of Thee" (Matt. iii. 14).

26. The absence in the Holy Family of that pseudo-asceticism which has so much confused the traditions respecting them, is strikingly proved by the notice, furnished by St. Paul in 1 Cor. ix. 5, that "the brethren of the Lord" were married men. At the same time there can be no doubt from the general character of St. James's Epistle, and from the notices of tradition, confirmed as they are by the narrative in the Acts, ch. xxi. 17 ff., and by Gal. ii. 11 ff., that he was in other matters a strong ascetic, and a rigid observer of the ceremonial Jewish customs. In the testimony of Hegesippus, quoted by Eus. II. E. ii. 23, we read, "This man was holy from his mother's womb. He drank no wine nor strong drink, and ate no animal food. No razor came upon his head, he anointed not himself with oil, and never used a bath. He only was licensed to enter into the holy places, for he wore not woollen, but linen only. And he was wont to enter alone into the temple, and was often found on his knees supplicating forgiveness for the people ; so that his knees grew hard like those of a camel, on account of his evermore kneeling in worship to God asking remission for the people ; and because of the abundance of his righteousness he was called the Just, and Oblias<sup>4</sup>.” And without taking all this as literal fact, it at least shows us the character which he bore, and the estimation in which he was held.

27. That such a person, when converted to the faith of Jesus, should have very soon been placed in high dignity in the Jerusalem church, is not to be wondered at. The very fact of that church being in some measure a continuation of the apostolic company, would, in the absence of Him who had been its centre beforetime, naturally incline their thoughts towards one who was the most eminent of His nearest relatives according to the flesh : and the strong Judaistic tendencies of that church would naturally group it around one who was so zealous a fautor of the Law.

28. This his pre-eminence seems to have been fully established as early as the imprisonment of St. Peter, Acts xii.<sup>5</sup> : i. e. about A.D. 44 : which would allow ample time for the reasonable growth in estimation and authority of one whose career as a disciple did not begin till the Ascension of our Lord, i. e. 14 years before<sup>6</sup>.

29. From this time onward, James is introduced, and simply by this name, as the president, or bishop, of the church at Jerusalem. In the apostolic council in Acts xv. (A.D. 50), we find him speaking last, after the rest had done, and delivering, with his “I, for my part, adjudge . . .” (ver. 19), that opinion, on which the act of the assembly was grounded. On St. Paul reaching Jerusalem in Acts xxi. (A.D. 58), we find him, on the day after his arrival, entering in “to James,” and it is added, “and all the elders were present :” shewing that the visit was a formal one, to a man in authority.

30. Thenceforward we have no more mention of James in the Acts. In Gal. i. 19, St. Paul relates, that at his first visit to Jerusalem after his conversion he saw “James the brother of the Lord :” but without any mark, unless the title "apostle," there given him, is to be taken as such, that he had then the pre-eminence which he afterwards enjoyed. The date of this visit I have set down elsewhere as A.D. 40<sup>7</sup>.

<sup>5</sup> Thus—for we can hardly suppose it to have been a sudden thing—we should have it already subsisting during the lifetime of the greater James, the son of Zebedee : one additional argument for distinguishing this James from James the less, the son of Alphaeus.

<sup>6</sup> For these dates, see the Chronological Table in the Introduction to the Acts. It has been objected, that it would be unlikely that one who at the Ascension was not a believer, should so soon after be found in the dignity of an Apostle. But the objectors forget, that less than half the time sufficed to raise one, who long after the Ascension was a persecutor and injurious, to the same dignity.

31. In the same apologetic narrative in the Epistle to the Galatians, St. Paul recounts the events, as far as they were germane to his purpose, of the apostolic council in Acts xv. And there we find James ranked with Cephas and John as "pillars" of the church. At some shortly subsequent time, probably in the end of A.D. 50 or the beginning of 51, we find, from the same narrative of St. Paul, that "certain from James" came down to Antioch, of whose Judaistic strictness Peter being afraid, prevaricated, and shrunk back from asserting his Christian liberty. This speaks for the influence of James, as it does also for its tendency.

32. At the time when we lose sight of James in the Acts of the Apostles, he would be, supposing him to have been next in the Holy Family to our Blessed Lord, and proceeding on the necessarily somewhat uncertain<sup>8</sup> inference deducible from the plain sense of Matt. i. 25, about sixty years of age.

33. From this time we are left to seek his history in tradition. We possess an account in Josephus of his character and martyrdom: "Ananias (the high priest) thinking that he had a convenient opportunity, Festus being dead and Albinus not yet arrived, summons an assembly of the judges: and bringing before it the brother of Jesus who was called Christ, James by name, and some others, he accused them of having broken the laws, and delivered them over to be stoned."

34. Further particulars of his death are given us from Hegesippus, by Eusebius: but they do not seem to tally with the above account in Josephus. According to Hegesippus, whose narrative is full of strange expressions, and savours largely of the fabulous, some of the seven sects of the people (see Eus. II. E. iv. 22) asked James, "what was the door of Jesus?" And by his preaching to them Jesus as the Christ, so many of them believed on Him, that "many even of the rulers believing, there was a tumult of the Jews and Scribes and Pharisees, saying that the whole people was in danger of receiving Jesus as the Christ." On this they invited James to deter the people from being thus deceived, standing on the "pinnacle of the temple" at the Passover, that he might be seen and heard by all. But, the story proceeds, when he was set there,

<sup>8</sup> Because there were also sisters of our Lord, and more than two, or the word "all" could not have been used of them, Matt. xiii. 55.

<sup>9</sup> On this expression, Valesius says, "Door, in this place, means, introduction or institution and initiation. Thus the door of Christ is nothing else than faith in God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, &c." But this seems doubtful, and the expression enigmatical.

and appealed to by them to undeceive the people, he "answered with a loud voice, 'Why ask ye me concerning Jesus the Son of man? For He sitteth at the right hand of the Supreme Power, and will one day come on the clouds of heaven.'" On this, many were confirmed in their belief, and glorified God for his testimony, and cried Hosanna to the Son of David. Whereat the Scribes and Pharisees said to one another, "'We did foolishly in giving occasion for such a testimony to Jesus: but let us go up and cast him down, that the people may be struck with fear and not believe him.' And they cried out, saying, 'O, O, the Just one is deceived.'" So they went up, and cast him down: and said to one another, "'Let us stone James the Just.' And they began to stone him: for the fall had not killed him, but he turned and knelt and said, 'I pray Thee, O Lord God the Father, forgive them, for they know not what they are doing.'" And while they were stoning him, a priest, one of the sons of Rechab, cried out, "'What are ye doing? the Just one is praying for you.' And one of them from among the fullers taking the club with which he beat clothes, with it struck the Just one on the head. And thus he suffered martyrdom. And they buried him on the spot, and his pillar yet remains by the temple."

35. This last sentence seems wholly inexplicable, considering that long before it was written both city and temple were destroyed. And the more so, as Hegesippus proceeds to say, that immediately upon St. James's martyrdom, Vespasian formed the siege of the city. He adds, "James was so wonderful a man, and so renowned for his righteousness among all men, that the thoughtful among the Jews believed that this was the cause of the siege of Jerusalem immediately after his martyrdom, and that this happened to them for no other reason than the crime which was perpetrated against him." And he quotes from Josephus, "Now these things happened to the Jews in vengeance for James the Just, who was brother to Jesus which was called Christ: because he was a very righteous man, and was slain by the Jews:" but no such passage as this latter is now found in Josephus.

36. The character of St. James is sufficiently indicated in the foregoing notices. He appears to have been a strong observer of the law, moral and ceremonial: and though willing to recognize the hand of God in the Gentile ministry of Paul and Barnabas, to have remained himself attached to the purely Judaistic form of Christianity. "Had not," observes Schaff, in his Church History, "a Peter, and above all a Paul, arisen as supplementary to James, Christianity would perhaps never have become entirely emancipated from the veil of Judaism and asserted its own independence. Still there was a necessity for the ministry of James. If any could win over the ancient covenant people, it was he. It pleased God to set so high an example of Old Test. piety in its purest form among the Jews, to make conversion to the Gospel, even at the eleventh hour, as easy as possible for them. But when they would not listen to the voice of this last messenger of peace, then was the measure of the divine patience exhausted, and the fearful and long-threatened judgment broke forth. And thus was the mission of James fulfilled. He was not to outlive the destruction of the holy city and the temple. According to Hegesippus, he was martyred in the year before that event, viz. A.D. 69."

37. If we adopt the above hypothetical calculation (par. 32), he would be, at the date of his martyrdom, about 71 years of age. The various particulars of his connexion with our present Epistle will be found in the following sections.

SECTION II.

FOR WHAT READERS THE EPISTLE WAS WRITTEN.

1. It is evident from the contents of the Epistle, that it was written for Christian readers. The Writer calls himself "a servant of the Lord Jesus Christ," and addresses the readers throughout as his "brethren." In ch. i. 18 he says that God has begotten us by the word of truth: in ch. ii. 1 he addresses them as having the faith of Jesus Christ the Lord of glory: in id. ver. 7, he speaks of the "worthy Name" by which they were called: and in ch. v. 7, he exhorts them to patience on the ground that the coming of the Lord was near. Besides which, the whole passage, ch. ii. 14, proceeds on the manifest supposition that writer and readers had one and the same faith.

2. At the same time, the address of the Epistle, "to the twelve tribes which are in the dispersion," which will not bear a spiritual meaning, but only the strictly national one, quite forbids us from supposing that Christians in general were in the Writer's view. Believing Jews, and they only, were the recipients of the Epistle. Not the words of the address, but the circumstances of the case, and the language of the Epistle, exclude those who did not believe.

3. This Judaistic direction of the letter is evident from ch. ii. 2, where the word "synagogue" is used to denote the place of assembly: from ib. 19, where monotheism is brought forward as the central point of faith: from ch. v. 12, where in the prohibition of swearing, the formulæ common among the Jews are introduced: from ib. ver. 14, where anointing with oil is mentioned. And not only so, but all the ethical errors which St. James combats, are of that kind which may be referred to carnal Judaism as their root.

4. Huther, from whom I have taken the foregoing paragraphs of this section, remarks that the argument against faith alone without works is no objection to the last-mentioned view, but is rather in refutation of this same Jewish error, which was the successor of the Pharisaical confidence in the fact of possessing the law, without a holy life: see Rom. ii. 17 ff. Justin Martyr says of the Jews: "They say that even if they be sinners, but know God, He will never impute sin to them." There is indeed no trace in the Epistle of an anxious and scrupulous observance of the Mosaic ritual on the part of the readers: but this may be because in the main on this point the Writer and his readers were agreed. And we do find in it traces of an erroneous estimate of the value of mere "religious service" (ch. i. 22 ff.): and a trace of fanatical zeal venting itself by "wrath."

5. The situation of these Judæo-Christian churches or congregations, as discernible in the Epistle, was this. They were tried by manifold trials, ch. i. 2. We are hardly justified in assuming that they were entirely made up of poor, on account of ch. ii. 6, 7: indeed, the former verses of that chapter seem to shew, that rich men were also found among them. However, this probably was so for the most part, and they were oppressed and dragged before the judgment-seats by the rich, which trials they did not bear with that patience and humility which might have been expected of them as Christians, nor did they in faith seek wisdom from God concerning them: but regarded Him as their tempter, and their lowliness as shame, paying carnal court to the rich, and despising the poor.

6. As might have been expected, such worldliness of spirit gave rise to strifes and dissensions among them, and to a neglect of self-preservation from the evil in the world, imagining that their Christian faith would suffice to save them, without a holy life.

7. There is some little difficulty in assigning a proper place to the rich men who are addressed in ch. v. 1 ff. They can hardly have been altogether out of the pale of the Christian body, or the denunciations would never have reached them at all: but it is fair to suppose that they were unworthy professing members of the churches.

8. It must be owned that the general state of the churches addressed, as indicated by this Epistle, is not such as any Christian teacher could look on with satisfaction. And it is extremely interesting to enquire, how far this unsatisfactory state furnishes us with any clue to the date of our Epistle: an enquiry which we shall follow out in our next section.

9. The designation "in the dispersion" need not necessarily limit the readers to the Jewish churches out of Palestine: but the greater circumference may include the lesser; the term "dispersion" may be vaguely used, regarding Jerusalem as the centre; and as in Acts viii. 1, where we read "and they all were dispersed throughout the lands of Judæa and Samaria,"—the exception being the Apostles, who remained in Jerusalem,—may comprehend Palestine itself.

SECTION III.

THE PLACE AND TIME OF WRITING.

1. As regards the place of writing, if the general opinion as to the author be assumed, there can be but one view. His fixed residence, and centre of influence, was JERUSALEM. There we find him, at every date in the apostolic period. If he wrote the Epistle, it was written from the holy city.

2. And with this the character of the Epistle very well agrees. Most of the Judæo-Christians addressed in it would be in the habit of coming up to Jerusalem from time to time to the feasts. There St. James, though at a distance, might become well acquainted with their state and temptations, and exercise superintendence over them.

3. It has been pointed out also<sup>1</sup>, that the physical notices inserted in the Epistle are very suitable to this supposition. The writer appears to have written not far from the sea, ch. i. 6, iii. 4: it was a land blessed with figs, oil, and wine, iii. 12. Wide as these notices may be, we have others which seem to come nearer to Palestine. Salt and bitter springs are familiar to him, iii. 11, 12: the land was exposed to drought, and was under anxiety for fear of failure of crops for want of rain, v. 17, 18: it was burnt up quickly by a hot wind (Kausôn, i. 11), which is a name not only belonging to West Asia, but especially known in Palestine. "Another phenomenon," says Hug, "which was found where the Writer was, decides for that locality: it is, the former and latter rain, which he names, ch. v. 7, as they were known in Palestine."

4. With regard to the date of the Epistle, opinions are more divided. That it was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, will follow as matter of course from what has already been said. But there are two other termini, with reference to which it is important that its place should be assigned. These are, 1) the publication of the doctrine of St. Paul respecting justification by faith only: and 2) the Apostolic council in Jerusalem of Acts xv.

5. A superficial view will suggest, that it cannot be till after the doctrine of justification by faith had been spread abroad, that ch. ii. 14 ff. can have been written. And this has been held even by some whose treatment of the Epistle has been far from superficial<sup>2</sup>. But I believe that a thorough and unbiassed weighing of probabilities will lead us to an opposite conclusion. It seems most improbable that, supposing ch. ii. 14 ff. to have been written after St. Paul's teaching on the point was known, St. James should have made no allusion either to St. Paul rightly understood, or to St. Paul wrongly understood. Surely such a method of proceeding, considering what strong words he uses, would be, to say the least, very ill-judged, or very careless: the former, if he only wished to prevent an erroneous conception of the great Apostle's doctrine,—the latter, if he wished to put himself into direct antagonism with it.

6. It is much more probable, that all which St. James says respecting works and faith has respect to a former and different state and period of the controversy; when, as was explained above<sup>3</sup>, the Jewish Pharisaic notions were being carried into the adopted belief in Christianity, and the danger was not, as afterwards, of a Jewish law-righteousness being set up, antagonistic to the righteousness which is by the faith of Christ, but of a Jewish reliance on exclusive purity of faith superseding the necessity of a holy life, which is inseparably bound up with any worthy holding of the Christian faith.

7. The objection brought against this view is, that the examples adduced by St. James are identical with those which we find in the Epistles of St. Paul, and even in that to the Hebrews: and that they presuppose acquaintance with those writings. But we may well answer, what right have we to make this, any more than the converse assumption? Or rather, for I do not believe the converse to be any more probable, why should not the occurrence of these common examples have been due in both cases to their having been the ordinary ones cited on the subject? What more certain, than that Abraham, the father of the faithful, would be cited in any dispute on the validity of faith? What more probable than that Rahab, a Canaanite, and a woman of loose life, who became sharer of the security of God's people simply because she believed God's threatenings, should be exalted into an instance on the one hand that even a contact with Israel's faith sufficed to save, and that the Apostle on the other should shew that such faith was not mere assent, but fruitful in practical consequences?

8. Again it is urged that, owing to several expressions and passages in our Epistle, we are obliged to believe that St. James had read and used the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians. Wiesinger says that any unbiassed reader will see in ch. i. 3, iv. 1, 12, allusions to Rom. v. 3, vi. 13, vii. 23, viii. 7, xiv. 4. Of these certainly the first is a close resemblance: but that in the others is faint, and the connecting of them together is quite fanciful. And even where close resemblance exists, if the nature of the expressions be considered, we shall see how little ground there is for ascribing to the one writer any necessary knowledge of the other. The expressions are, "the proof of your faith worketh patience," James i. 3: "tribulation worketh patience," Rom. v. 3. Now what could be more likely than that a "faithful saying" like this, tending to console the primitive believers under afflictions which were coeval with their first profession of the Gospel, should have been a commonplace in the mouths of their teachers? And accordingly we find a portion of St. James's expression, viz. "the proof of your faith," again occurring in 1 Pet. i. 7: a circumstance which may or may not indicate an acquaintance with the contents of our Epistle.

9. A similar inference has been drawn from the use by St. James of such terms as "to be justified," "by faith," "by works:" which, it is urged, no New Test. writer except St. Paul, or, in the case of the verb, St. Luke, under influence of St. Paul, has used. But here again it is manifest that the inference will not hold. The subject, as argued by St. Paul, was no new one, but had long been in the thoughts and disputes of the primitive believers<sup>4</sup>.

10. With regard to the other question, as to whether our Epistle must be dated before or after the council in Acts xv., one consideration is, to my mind, decisive. We have no mention in it of any controversy respecting the ceremonial observance of the Jewish law, nor any allusion to the duties of the Judæo-Christian believers in this respect. Now this certainly could not have been, after the dispute of Acts xv. 1 ff. If we compare what St. Paul relates in Gal. ii. 11 ff. (see the last note) of the influence of certain from James, and the narrative of Acts xxi. 18—25, with the entire absence in this Epistle of all notice of the subjects in question, we must, I think, determine that, at the time of writing the Epistle, no such question had arisen. The obligation of observing the Jewish ceremonial law was as yet confessed among Jewish Christians, and therefore needed no enforcing.

11. But here again various objections are brought against assigning so early a date to our Epistle as before the Jerusalem council, principally derived from the supposed difficulty of imagining so much development at that time in the Judæo-Christian congregations. We find, it is alleged, elders or presbyters of an assembly (ecclesia), which is not the mere Jewish synagogue used in common by both, but a regularly organized congregation.

12. Now we may fairly say, that this objection is unfounded. The Christian "ecclesia" is mentioned by our Lord Himself in Matt. xviii. 17, and was so easy and matter-of-course a successor of the synagogue, that it would be sure to be established, wherever there was a Christian community. We find that the different varieties of Jews had their separate synagogues, Acts vi. 9: and the establishment of a separate organization and place of worship would be the obvious and immediate consequence of the recognition of Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah. In such a congregation, elders (presbyters) would be a matter of course.

13. It is also objected, that in the Epistle the readers are treated as mature in the belief and doctrines of the Gospel: that it exhorts, but does not teach<sup>5</sup>. Witness, it is said, the allusions to their knowledge, and exhortations to perfection, ch. i. 3; iii. 1; iv. 1. But in those passages there is nothing which might not well apply to the primitive Jewish believers: nothing which, from their knowledge of the O. T., and of the moral teaching of our Lord, they might not well have been aware of.

14. Yet again it is said, that the character of the faults here stigmatized in the Christian congregations is such as to require a considerable period for their development<sup>6</sup>: that they are those which arise from relaxation of the moral energy with which we must suppose the first Jewish converts to have received the Gospel. In answer to this, we may point to the length of time which may well be allowed as having elapsed between the first Pentecost sermon and the time of writing the Epistle, and to the rapidity of the dissemination of practical error, and the progress of moral deterioration, when once set in. We may also remind the reader of the state of the Jewish church and the heathen world around, as shewing that it must not be supposed that all these evils sprung up within the Christian communities themselves: rather we may say, that the seed fell on soil in which these thorns were already sown,—and that, even conceding the position above assumed, § i. 1, a very short time,—less than the 20 years which elapsed between the first Pentecost and the Jerusalem council,—would have sufficed for the growth of any such errors as we find stigmatized in this Epistle.

15. "Where," asks Wiesinger, "shall we look for the Judæo-Christian churches out of Palestine, which will satisfy the postulates of the Epistle?" I answer, in the notice of Acts ii. 5—11, in following out which, we must believe that Christian churches of the dispersion were very widely founded at a date immediately following the great outpouring of the Spirit. Such a persuasion does not compel us to believe that our Epistle was addressed principally to the church at Antioch, or to those in Syria and Cilicia, but leaves the address of it in all the extent of its own words, "to the twelve tribes which are in the dispersion."

16. The notice of Acts xi. 19 ff., will amply provide for such Christian congregations, consisting mainly or entirely of Jewish believers, as the purposes of this Epistle require. And that notice may surely be regarded as a record of that taking place with increased energy nearer home, which must have been long going on far and wide, owing to the agency of the first Pentecostal believers. We find traces of this in the first missionary journey of Paul and Barnabas, where in several cases we have, besides the new converts made, an implied background of "disciples," naturally consisting mainly of Jews; and it appears to have been at and by this visit chiefly that the enmity of the Jews every where against the Gentile converts, and against the Gospel as admitting them, was first stirred up.

17. These things being considered, I cannot agree with Wiesinger and Schmid in placing our Epistle late in the first age of the church; but should, with the majority of recent Commentators, and historians, including Schneckenburger, Theile, Neander, Thiersch, Hofmann, and Schaff, place it before, perhaps not long before, the Jerusalem council: somewhere, it may be, about the year 45 A.D.

SECTION IV.

OBJECT, CONTENTS, AND STYLE.

1. The object of the Epistle has been already partially indicated, in treating of its readers. It was ethical, rather than didactic. They had fallen into many faults incident to their character and position. Their outward trials were not producing in them that confirmation of faith, and that steadfastness, for which they were sent, but they were deteriorating, instead of improving, under them. St. James therefore wrote his hortatory and minatory Epistle, to bring them to a sense of their Christian state under the Father of wisdom and the Lord of glory, subjects as they were of the perfect law of liberty, new-begotten by the divine word, married unto Christ, and waiting in patience for His advent to judgment.

2. The letter is full of earnestness, plain speaking, holy severity. The brother of Him who opened His teaching with the Sermon on the Mount, seems to have deeply imbibed the words and maxims of it, as the law of Christian morals. The characteristic of his readers was the lack of living faith: the falling asunder, as it has been well called, of knowledge and action, of head and heart. And no portion of the divine teaching could be better calculated to sound the depths of the treacherous and disloyal heart, than this first exposition by our Lord, who knew the heart, of the difference between the old law, in its externality, and the searching spiritual law of the Gospel<sup>7</sup>.

3. The main theme of the Epistle may be described as being the

<sup>7</sup> The connexion between our Epistle and the Sermon on the Mount has often been noticed: and the principal parallels will be found pointed out in the reff. and commentary. I subjoin a list of them: ch. i. 2, Matt. v. 10-12; ch. i. 4, Matt. v. 48; ch. i. 5, v. 15, Matt. vii. 7 ff.; ch. i. 9, Matt. v. 3; ch. i. 20, Matt. v. 22; ch. ii. 13, Matt. vi. 14, 15, v. 7; ch. ii. 14 ff., Matt. vii. 21 ff.; ch. iii. 17, 18, Matt. v. 9; ch. iv. 4, "perfect man," in the perfection of the Christian life : the "door of the perfect law:" and his state and duties are described and enforced, not in the abstract, but in a multitude of living connexions and circumstances of actual life, as might suit the temptations and necessities of the readers.

4. St. James begins by a reference to their "temptations," exhorting them to consider them matter of joy, as sent for the trial of their faith and accomplishment of their perfection, which must be carried on in faith, and prayer to God for wisdom, without doubt and wavering. The worldly rich are in fact not the happy, but the subjects of God's judgment: the humble and enduring is he to whom the crown of life is promised (ch. i. 1—12).

5. Then he comes to treat of a "tempting" which is not from God, but from their own lusts. God on the contrary is the Author of every good and perfect gift, as especially of their new birth by the word of His truth. The inference from this is that, seeing they have their evil from themselves, but their good from Him, they should be eager to hear, but slow to speak and slow to wrath, receiving the word in meekness, being thoroughly penetrated with its influence, in deed and word, not paying to God the vain "religious service" of outward conformity only, but that of acts of holy charity and a spotless life.

6. The second chapter introduces the mention of their special faults : and as intimately connected with ch. i. 27, first that of respect of persons in regard of worldly wealth (ii. 1—13); and then that of supposing a bare assensive faith sufficient for salvation without its living fruits in a holy life (ii. 14—26). Next, the exhortation of ch. i. 19, "slow to speak, slow to wrath," is again taken up, and in ch. iii. 1—18, these two particulars are treated, in the duties of curbing the tongue and the contentious temper.

7. This last leads naturally on in ch. iv. 1—12 to the detection of the real source of all contention and strife, viz. in their lusts, inflamed by the solicitations of the devil. These solicitations they are to resist, by penitence before God, and by curbing their proud and uncharitable judgments. Then he turns (iv. 13—v. 6) to those who live in their pride and worldliness, in assumed independence on God, and severely reproves the rich for their oppression and defrauding of the poor, warning them of a day of retribution at hand.

8. Then, after an earnest exhortation to patient endurance (ch. v. 7—11) and to abstain from words of hasty profanity (v. 12), he takes occasion in prescribing to them what to do in adversity, prosperity and sickness, and as to mutual confession of sin, to extol the efficacy of prayer (v. 13—18), and ends with pronouncing the blessedness of turning a sinner from the error of his way.

Matt. vi. 24; ch. iv. 10, Matt. v. 3, 4; ch. iv. 11, Matt. vii. 1 f.; ch. v. 2, Matt. vi. 19; ch. v. 10, Matt. v. 12; ch. v. 12, Matt. v. 33 ff.; and from other discourses of our Lord, ch. i. 14, Matt. xv. 19; ch. iv. 12, Matt. x. 28. Compare also the places where the rich are denounced with Luke vi. 24 ff.

9. The character of the Epistle is thus a mixed one: consolatory and hortatory for the believing brethren; earnest, minatory, and polemical, against those who disgraced their Christian profession by practical error. Even in ch. ii. 14—26, where alone the Writer seems to be combating doctrinal error, all his contention is rather in the realm of practice: he is more anxious to shew that justification cannot be brought about by a kind of faith which is destitute of the practical fruits of a Christian life, than to trace the ultimate ground, theologically speaking, of justification in the sight of God.

10. As regards the style and diction of our Epistle, Huther has well described it as being “not only fresh and vivid, the immediate outflowing of a deep and earnest spirit, but at the same time sententious, and rich in graphic figure. Gnome follows after gnome, and the discourse hastens from one similitude to another: so that the diction often passes into the poetical, and in some parts is like that of the Old Test. prophets. We do not find logical connexion, like that in St. Paul: but the thoughts arrange themselves in single groups, which are strongly marked off from one another. We every where see that the author has his object clearly in sight, and puts it forth with graphic concreteness. Strong feelings, as Kern remarks, produce strong diction: and the style acquires emphasis and majesty by the climax of thoughts and words ever regularly and rhetorically arrived at, and by the constantly occurring antithesis.”

11. The introduction and putting forth of the thoughts also is peculiar. “The Writer ever goes at once into the midst of his subject; and with the first sentence which begins a section,—usually an interrogative or imperative one,—says out at once fully and entirely that which he has in his heart: so that in almost every case the first words of each section might serve as a title for it. The further development of the thought then is regressive, explaining and grounding the preceding sentence, and concludes with a comprehensive sentence, recapitulating that with which he began.”

12. The Greek of our Epistle is peculiar. It is comparatively free from Hebraisms; the words are weighty and expressive: the constructions for the most part those found in the purer Greek. It does not sound, in reading, like the rest of the New Test. There is only a slight link or two, connecting the speech of James in Acts xv. with it, which serves somewhat to identify its language with that. Such is “Hear, my beloved brethren,” ch. ii. 5, compared with “Brethren, hear me,” Acts xv.

13. We trace his hand also in the only two places where in a Christian Epistle the ordinary Greek greeting occurs, Acts xv. 23; James i. 1. The Greek style of this Epistle must ever remain, considering the native place and position of its Writer, one of those difficulties with which it is impossible for us now to deal satisfactorily.

SECTION V.

ITS GENUINENESS, AND PLACE IN THE CANON.

1. The previous enquiry, in § i., regarding the authorship of our Epistle, proceeded on assuming that the commonly received superscription rightly designates the Epistle as the work of some apostolic person bearing the name of James. It remains for us now to enquire, how far such an assumption is justified.

2. And here we have before us a question not easily settled, and on which both the ancients and moderns have been much divided. The sum of ancient testimony is as follows :

3. The intimate connexion admitted to subsist between it and the first Epistle of St. Peter, while it is valueless as an evidence of priority on either side, may fairly be taken into account as an element in our enquiry<sup>8</sup>. The places cited in the note cannot be for a moment fairly called imitations. The case stands much as that between the common passages in 2 Peter and Jude. It may legitimately be supposed, that the writers of the two Epistles were accustomed to hold the same language and exhort much in the same strains ;—were employed in the apostolic work together : and that thus portions of that teaching in the Spirit, which they had long carried on in common at Jerusalem, found their way into their writings also. I cannot but regard this circumstance as a weighty evidence for the Epistle being written in the apostolic age, and by one who was St. Peter's friend and companion at Jerusalem in its earlier periods.

4. If this were so, it surprises us to find the Epistle so little used or referred to by the Apostolic Fathers. Several more or less distant and uncertain allusions have been pointed out in the writings of Clement of Rome<sup>9</sup>, Hermas<sup>1</sup>, and Irenæus<sup>2</sup>. Of these the two former are very <sup>8</sup> Compare especially James i. 2 f. with 1 Pet. i. 6, 7 ; i. 10 f. with 1 Pet. i. 24 ; i. 21, with 1 Pet. ii. 1 f. ; iv. 6, 10, with 1 Pet. v. 5 f. ; v. 20, with 1 Pet. iv. 8.

<sup>9</sup> " Abraham, who was called the Friend, was found faithful, in becoming obedient to the commands of God : " compare James ii. 21, 23. And again : " For her faith and hospitality Rahab the harlot was saved : " compare James ii. 25.

<sup>1</sup> " The devil can wrestle against us, but he cannot wrestle us down : if then thou resist him, he will be conquered and flee from thee in disgrace : " compare James iv. 7.

<sup>2</sup> " Abraham . . . believed God, and it was reckoned to him for righteousness, and he was called the Friend of God : " compare James ii. 23.

doubtful indeed : the latter would seem as if Irenæus was acquainted with our Epistle, seeing that two particulars not conjoined, and one of them not perhaps even mentioned by the Septuagint <sup>3</sup>, are coupled by him as they are in this Epistle. Still, for this citation we have not the Greek of Irenæus, but only his Latin interpreter.

5. It is difficult to believe, notwithstanding the precariousness of the phrases cited to prove it, but that Hermas was acquainted with our Epistle. The whole cast of some passages resembles its tone and tenor exceedingly. This is especially so in a passage, where he treats of double-mindedness, and in fact expands the thoughts and words of St. James : e. g., “Cast out of thyself double-mindedness, and be not double-minded in any thing in thy petitions from God . . . . for God is not, as men, mindful of grudges, but Himself incapable of bearing malice, and is merciful over His creatures . . . . but if thou doubt in thine heart, thou shalt receive nothing of thy petitions. For those who doubt in their approaches to God, these are as it were double-minded and receive nothing at all of their petitions. But those who are perfect in the faith ask all things, trusting in God, and receive them because they ask without doubting, not double-minded in any thing. For every double-minded man if he repent not, shall with difficulty be saved.” Compare this with our ch. i. 5—7, and it is hardly possible to believe the two entirely independent of one another.

6. The first Father who has expressly cited the Epistle is Origen. In his Commentary on John we read, “For if faith be predicated, but be without works, such faith is dead, as we have read in the current Epistle of James.” And in another work, “Wherefore also it has been said, that God is untempted by evil,” James i. 13. And in several other places in Rufinus’s Latin version we have similar citations : “The Apostle James says,” &c.

7. Eusebius says, “Now of those books which are disputed, but still well known to the Christian public, we have that attributed to James, and that to Jude, and the second Epistle of Peter, and the second and third of John, be it of the Evangelist or of some other of the same name.” And again in H. E. ii. 23, after relating the death of St. James, he says, “Such was the history of James, whose is said to be the first of the Epistles called catholic : but it is to be noted that it is accounted spurious : and but few of the ancients have mentioned it, as neither have they that which goes by the name of Jude, which is also one of the seven called catholic. Yet we know that these with the rest are publicly read in most churches.” In this passage it can hardly be that “it is accounted spurious” expresses Eusebius’s own opinion as to the fact,—

“it is spurious:”—but it simply announces the fact, that some so think of it.

8. Eusebius says of Clement of Alexandria, “that he wrote short expositions of all the books of the (Old and ?) New Testament, not even passing over the disputed ones, the Epistle of Jude, and the rest called catholic, and that of Barnabas, and the book called the Apocalypse of Peter.” But it is manifest, that even were we to take this as fact, its testimony, when taken with the last clause, is very feeble as regards the canonicity of our Epistle.

9. Hippolytus, Bishop of Portus near Rome, quotes our Epistle apparently as Scripture, but not by name: “Your lamps are dark by reason of your want of compassion: depart from me, for judgment shall be without mercy to him who shewed no mercy” (James ii. 13).

10. Jerome says, “James, who is called the brother of the Lord, sur-named the Just . . . . wrote one Epistle only, which is among the seven catholic ones, which is moreover said to have been published by some one else under his name, although by degrees, as time went on, it has gained authority.”

11. Against these somewhat equivocal testimonies of the early Fathers, may be set the fact, that the Peschito, or primitive Syriac version, contained our Epistle from the first, although it omitted the second and third of John, Jude, and the Apocalypse. And this fact has the more weight, because the Syrian church lay so near to the country whence the Epistle originated, and to those to which it was, in all probability, principally addressed. And, as might be expected, we find it received and cited by the Syrian church as the Epistle of James the Lord’s brother. So Ephrem Syrus, and other writers of that church.

12. In the Western church also it soon, though gradually, rose into general acceptance and canonical authority. It was recognized by the council of Carthage in 397. From that time onward, we find it universally received: and indeed the great company of illustrious Greek Fathers of the fourth century all quote it as canonical Scripture: Athanasius, both the Cyrils, Gregory of Nazianzum, Epiphanius, Philastrius, Chrysostom, the author of the Synopsis, &c.

13. Various reasons might be assigned for the delay in receiving the Epistle, and the doubts long prevalent respecting it. The uncertainty about the personal identity and standing of its Writer: the fact, that it was addressed entirely to Jewish believers: the omission in it of most of the particulars of distinctively Christian doctrine: its seeming opposition to the doctrine of justification as laid down by St. Paul: all these would naturally work together to indispose the minds of Gentile Christians towards it. But as Thiersch and Wiesinger have rightly remarked, so much the more valuable are those recognitions of its genuineness and canonicity which we do meet with.

14. At the time of the Reformation, the doubts which once prevailed concerning the Epistle, were again revived. Erasmus, Cardinal Cajetan, Luther, Grotius, Wetstein, shared more or less in these doubts; and their example has been followed by several of the modern Commentators, e. g. Schleiermacher, De Wette, Reuss, Baur, Schweigler, Ritschl. The opinions of all these and their grounds will be found fairly set forth in Davidson's Introduction to the New Test., vol. iii. pp. 339—345.

15. On the whole, on any intelligible principles of canonical reception of early writings, we cannot refuse this Epistle a place in the canon. That that place was given it from the first in some part of the church; that, in spite of many adverse circumstances, it gradually won that place in other parts; that when thoroughly considered, it is so consistent with and worthy of his character and standing whose name it bears; that it is marked off by so strong a line of distinction from the writings and epistles which have not attained a place in the canon: all these are considerations which, though they do not in this, any more than in other cases, amount to demonstration, yet furnish when combined a proof hardly to be resisted, that the place where we now find it in the New Test. canon is that which it ought to have, and which God in His Providence has guided His Church to assign to it.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF PETER.

ITS GENUINENESS.

1. THE First Epistle of St. Peter was universally acknowledged by the ancient church as a part of the Christian Scriptures. The earliest testimony in its favour is found in the Second Epistle of Peter (iii. 1), a document which, even if we were to concede its spuriousness as an Apostolic Epistle, yet cannot be removed far in date from the age of the Apostles.

2. The second witness is POLYCARP: of whom Eusebius writes, "Polycarp, in the above-mentioned still current work of his to the Philippians, uses certain testimonies from the former Epistle of Peter." These testimonies are too numerous to be cited at length. In ch. ii., he cites 1 Pet. i. 13, 21; iii. 9; in ch. v., 1 Pet. ii. 11; in ch. vi., 1 Pet. iv. 7; in ch. viii., 1 Pet. ii. 21—24; in ch. x., 1 Pet. ii. 17, 12. Eusebius also says of PAPIAS, II. E. iii. 39, "The same uses testimonies from the former Epistle of John, and that of Peter also."

3. None of the above testimonies from Polycarp mention the Epistle expressly; but IRENÆUS does so, more than once: c. g.:

"And Peter says in his Epistle: 'Whom not seeing ye love: in whom though ye see Him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable'" (1 Pet. i. 8).

And again:

"And for this reason Peter says, that 'we have not our liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, but for proof and manifestation of our faith'" (1 Pet. ii. 16).

4. CLEMENT of ALEXANDRIA also quotes it expressly:

"Wherefore also the admirable Peter says, 'Beloved, I beseech you as strangers,' &c." (1 Pet. ii. 11 ff., 15 f.)

And again:

"And Peter in his Epistle says the like, 'So that your faith and your hope,' &c."

And similarly in several other places, given in the Prolegomena to my Greek Test.

5. Besides these express citations, he several times quotes without mentioning the name.

6. It is to be noted likewise that the heretic Theodotus, in the tract commonly printed among the works of Clement of Alexandria, twice expressly quotes our Epistle.

7. ORIGEN bears, expressly and often, the same testimony. In the passage on the canon, reported by Eusebius, he says:

"And Peter, on whom the church of Christ is built, over which the gates of hell shall not prevail, has left one universally received Epistle: and perhaps a second; for it is doubted."

Again:

"Peter also sounded with the two trumpets of his Epistles."

And in many other places: see as above.

8. TERTULLIAN testifies to the same point:

"Peter, writing to the inhabitants of Pontus, says, 'For what glory is it if when ye are punished [not] as delinquents, ye endure it?' &c." (1 Pet. ii. 20 f.)

And again:

"For Peter had said that the king is to be honoured" (1 Pet. ii. 17).

9. The opinion of Eusebius, as gathered from those before him, is this:

"One Epistle of Peter, that called his first, is universally received: this Epistle the elders of old in their writings have used as undoubted."

10. This Epistle is also found in the Peschito or ancient Syriac version, which contains three only of the Catholic Epistles. It is true, it is not mentioned in the fragment on the canon known by the name of Muratori. But the passage is not easily understood. The simplest interpretation of the sentence is, "we receive also only the Apocalypses of John and Peter, which (latter) some of our brethren refuse to have read in the church."

11. It is inferred from a passage of Leontius of Byzantium (died about 610) that Theodore of Mopsuestia rejected the Epistle: but the inference is not a safe one, the words being too general to warrant it.

12. It is said, in a passage of Petrus Siculus, that the Paulicians rejected it:

"But the two Catholic Epistles of Peter the prince of the Apostles they reject, being strongly set against him."

13. So that, with one or two insignificant exceptions, we have the united testimony of antiquity in its favour. It would be superfluous to go on citing later testimonies on the same side.

14. The first doubt in modern times was thrown on its authenticity by Cludius, on the ground that its thoughts and expressions are too like those of St. Paul, to have been written by the Apostle whose name it bears.

15. This was taken up by Eichhorn, and expanded into the hypothesis, that some one wrote the Epistle who had been long with St. Paul, and had adopted his ideas and phrases: and as this will not fit St. Peter, he supposes that St. Peter found the material, but it was worked up by John Mark. This hypothesis is rejected by Bertholdt, but taken up in another form: viz. by adopting the idea hinted at by Jerome and formally announced by Baronius, that the Epistle was originally written in Hebrew (so Baronius), or Aramaic, and rendered into Greek by Mark (so Baronius) or Silvanus. But, as Huther well remarks, this hypothesis is as arbitrary as the other: and the whole diction of the Epistle and its modes of citation protest against its being thought a translation.

16. De Wette finds reason to doubt the genuineness, but on grounds entirely derived from the Epistle itself. He thinks it too deficient in originality, and too much made up of reminiscences from other epistles. This ground of objection will be examined, and found untenable, in treating of the character and style of the Epistle.

17. It was to be supposed, that the Tübingen school, as represented by Baur and Schweigler, would repudiate this, as they have done so many other Epistles. The arguments on which the latter of these founds his rejection are worth enumerating, admitting, as most of them do, of a ready and satisfactory answer. They are<sup>4</sup>, 1) the want of any definite external occasion, and the generality of the contents and purpose. But it may be replied, it is surely too much to expect that an Apostle should be confined to writing to those churches with which he has been externally connected, and in which an assignable cause for his writing has arisen: and besides, it will be found below, in treating on the occasion and object of the Epistle, that these, though of a general nature, are perfectly and satisfactorily assignable.

2) The want of a marked individual character both in composition and in theology. But on the one hand this is not conceded in toto, and on the other it is manifestly unreasonable to require that in one man's writing it should be so plainly notable as in that of another: in St. Peter, as in St. Paul and St. John.

3) The want of close connexion and evolution of thought. But, it may be answered, the purpose and character of the Epistle itself forbids us to require such a connexion: and we may notice that even in St. Paul's Epistles Schwegler professes not to be able to find it<sup>5</sup>.

4) The impossibility that Peter, labouring in the far East, could have become acquainted with the later Epistles of St. Paul so soon (assuming their genuineness) after their composition. But, it is replied, there is no trace in our Epistle of acquaintance with the latest, viz. that to Titus and 2 Timothy. The only possible difficulty is the apparent (?) acquaintance with 1 Timothy: but this may have come to St. Peter through John Mark.

5) The impossibility, on the assumption of the Epistle being written in Babylon (see below, § iv., on the time and place of writing), of bringing together the Neronian persecution which is alluded to in it, and the death of St. Peter by martyrdom during that very persecution. But it is a pure assumption that the persecution alluded to in the Epistle is that under Nero; and another, that the Apostle suffered martyrdom under Nero at that time.

18. It is also not without interest, to discuss the reasons which Schwegler adduces for believing the Epistle to be a production of the post-apostolic age under Trajan. They are, 1) the tranquil unimpassioned tone of the Epistle, contrasted with the effect on the Christians of the Neronian persecution: 2) the circumstance that under the Neronian persecution the Christians were involved in a charge of a definite crime, viz. the setting fire to the city, whereas in our Epistle they suffer "as Christians," on account of the general suspicion of a bad life (as evil doers): 3) the improbability that the Neronian persecution extended beyond Rome: 4) the assumption in the Epistle of regular legal processes, whereas the persecution under Nero was more of a tumultuary act: 5) the state of Christianity in Asia Minor as depicted by the Epistle, answering to that which we find in the letter of Pliny to Trajan.

19. But to these reasons it has been well replied by Huther, 1) that the tranquillity of tone is no less remarkable, as under the later persecution, than under the earlier, and that any other tone would have been unworthy of an Apostle: 2) the suffering of Christians, as Christians, did not begin in Trajan's persecution, but was common to the earlier ones likewise: 3) even if the Neronian persecution did not extend beyond Rome, the Christians in the provinces were always liable to be persecuted owing to the same popular hatred: 4) there is in reality no trace of judicial proceedings in our Epistle: 5) the features of persecution in the Epistle do not agree with those in Pliny's letter: there, the Christians are formally put to death as such: here, we have no trace of such a sentence being carried out against them.

20. The hypothesis of Schweigler, that the purpose of the Epistle is to be detected in ch. v. 12, as one of reconciliation of the teachings of St. Peter and St. Paul by some disciple of the former who was inclined also to the latter, is well treated by Huther as entirely destitute of foundation.

21. So that, whether we consider external evidence, or the futility of internal objections, we can have no hesitation in accepting the Epistle as the undoubted work of the Apostle whose name it bears.

SECTION II.

ITS AUTHOR.

1. The Apostle Peter, properly called Simon or Simeon (Acts xv. 14, 2 Pet. i. 1), was born at Bethsaida on the sea of Galilee (John i. 45), the son of one Jonas (Matt. xvi. 17) or John (John i. 43, xxi. 15), with whom, and with his brother Andrew, he carried on the trade of a fisherman at Capernaum, where he afterwards lived (Matt. viii. 14, iv. 18, and parallels, Luke v. 3), with his wife's mother, being a married man<sup>6</sup> (1 Cor. ix. 5).

2. He became very early a disciple of our Lord, being brought to Him by his brother Andrew, who was a disciple of John the Baptist, and had followed Jesus on hearing him designated by his master as the

<sup>6</sup> His wife is variously named Concordia or Perpetua by the legends. Clement of Alexandria relates, "They say that St. Peter, beholding his wife led out to death, was rejoiced at her calling of the Lord, and her reception to her heavenly home, and cried out encouragingly and exhortingly, addressing her by name: O thou, remember the Lord." And elsewhere he says, "Peter and Philip were fathers of families." On the question whether Mark was his son, see note on 1 Pet. v. 13.

Lamb of God (John i. 35—43). It was on this occasion that Jesus, looking on him and foreseeing his disposition and worth in the work of His Kingdom, gave him the name Cephas, in Greek Petros, a stone or Rock (John i. 43 &c. Mark iii. 16). He does not however appear to have attached himself finally to our Lord till after two, or perhaps more, summons to do so (compare John, as before : Matt. iv. 18, and parallel in Mark : Luke v. 1 ff. and notes), and to have carried on his fishing trade at intervals.

3. It would be beside the present purpose to follow St. Peter through the well-known incidents of his apostolic life. His forwardness in reply and profession of warm affection, his thorough appreciation of our Lord's high Office and Person, the glorious promise made to him as the Rock of the Church on that account (Matt. xvi. 16 and note), his rashness, and over-confidence in himself, issuing in his triple denial of Christ and his bitter repentance, his reassurance by the gentle but searching words of his risen Master (John xxi. 15 ff.),—these are familiar to every Christian child: nor is there any one of the leading characters in the Gospel history which makes so deep an impression on the heart and affections of the young and susceptible. The weakness, and the strength, of our human love for Christ, are both mercifully provided for in the character of the greatest of the Twelve.

4. After the Ascension, we find St. Peter at once taking the lead in the Christian body (Acts i. 15 ff.), and on the descent of the Holy Spirit, he, to whom were given the keys of Christ's kingdom,—who was to be the stone on which the church was to be built, first receives into the door of the church, and builds up on his own holy faith, three thousand of Israel (Acts ii. 14—41): and on another occasion soon following, some thousands more (Acts iv. 4).

5. This prominence of St. Peter in the church continues, till by his specially directed ministry the door into the privileges of the gospel covenant is opened also to the Gentiles, by the baptism of Cornelius and his party (Acts x.). But he was not to be the Apostle of the Gentiles: and by this very procedure, the way was being made plain for the ministry of another, who was now ripening for the work in the retirement of his home at Tarsus.

6. From this time onward, the prominence of St. Peter wanes behind that of St. Paul. The “first to the Jew” was rapidly coming to its conclusion: and the great spreading of the feast to the Gentile world was henceforward to occupy the earnest attention of the apostolic missionaries, as it has done the pages of the inspired record. Only once or twice, besides the notices to be gathered from this Epistle itself, do we gain a glimpse of St. Peter after this time. In the apostolic council in Acts xv. we find him consistently carrying out the part which had been divinely assigned him in the admission of the Gentiles into the church; and earnestly supporting the freedom of the Gentile converts from the observance of the Mosaic law.

7. This is the last notice which we have of him, or indeed of any of the Twelve, in the Acts. But from Gal. ii. 11, we learn a circumstance which is singularly in keeping with St. Peter's former character: that when at Antioch, in all probability not long after the apostolic council, he was practising the freedom which he had defended there, but being afraid of certain who came from James, he withdrew himself and separated from the Gentile converts, thereby incurring a severe rebuke from St. Paul (ib. vv. 14—21).

8. From this time, we depend on such scanty hints as the Epistles furnish, and upon ecclesiastical tradition, for further notices of St. Peter. We may indeed, from 1 Cor. ix. 5, infer that he travelled about on the missionary work, and took his wife with him: but in what part of the Roman empire, we know not. If the Babylon of ch. v. 13 is to be taken literally, he passed the boundaries of that empire into Parthia.

9. The best text, and starting-point, for treating of the traditions respecting St. Peter, is the account given by Jerome, after others:

“Simon Peter, the first (princeps) of the Apostles, after being bishop of Antioch and preaching to the dispersion of the believers of the circumcision, in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, in the second year of Claudius, went to Rome to combat Simon Magus, and there held the sacerdotal seat for twenty-five years, even to the last year of Nero, that is, the fourteenth. By this emperor he was crucified and crowned with martyrdom, his head being turned towards the earth and his feet in the air, protesting that he was unworthy to be crucified as his Lord was. He was buried at Rome in the Vatican by the side of the triumphal way, and is honoured with the veneration of the whole city.”

10. In this account, according to Luther, we have the following doubtful particulars:

1) The episcopate of St. Peter at Antioch. This is reported also by Eusebius, who makes St. Peter found the church at Antioch, in contradiction to Acts xi. 19—22.

2) His personal work among the churches of Asia Minor, which seems to be a mere assertion founded on Origen's conjecture that “Peter seems to have preached to the dispersed Jews in Pontus,” &c., grounded upon 1 Pet. i. 1<sup>7</sup>.

3) His journey to Rome to oppose Simon Magus: which, as Eusebius appeals to Justin Martyr for it, appears to be founded on Justin's story of the statue found at Rome, see note on Acts viii. 10: which is now known to have been a statue of the Sabine god Semo Sancus.

4) The twenty-five years' bishopric of St. Peter at Rome. This has been minutely examined by Wieseler, and shewn on chronological grounds to have been impossible, and to be inconsistent with Gal. ii. 7—9, according to which Peter, who by this hypothesis had been then for many years bishop of Rome, and continued so for many years after, was to go to the circumcision as their Apostle.

5) The peculiar manner of his crucifixion, which seems to have been an idea arising from Origen's expression, which it has been suggested, might import no more than capital punishment. I have shewn in my Greek Test. that this cannot be, and that the words must be taken literally.

11. The residuum from this passage, which is worth our consideration and elucidation, is, the death of the Apostle by martyrdom, and that in Rome. This seems to be the concurrent testimony of Christian antiquity. I subjoin the principal testimonies.

12. First we have John xxi. 19, which, whether a notice inserted after the fact, and referring to it, or an authoritative exposition of our Lord's words to Peter, equally point to the fact as having been, or about to be, accomplished.

13. Clement of Rome says, "Peter, by reason of unrighteous zeal against him, endured, not one or two, but numerous persecutions, and thus suffering martyrdom, went to his deserved place of glory."

Here indeed there is no mention of Rome; but the close juxtaposition of the celebrated passage about St. Paul (cited in this Introduction, ch. x. § ii. 20) seems to point to that city as the place of Peter's martyrdom. Besides, I would suggest that these words, "he went to his deserved place of glory," are a reminiscence of Acts xii. 17, "and he went out and departed to another place," which by the advocates of the twenty-five years' Roman bishopric was interpreted to mean Rome.

14. Dionysius of Corinth is cited by Eusebius, as saying in an Epistle to the Romans, that Peter and Paul together founded the church of Corinth, and then went to Italy where they founded the Roman church, taught, and suffered martyrdom.

15. Tertullian says that Peter and Paul left the Gospel to the Romans signed with their blood. And in another place he speaks of Rome as

"That happy church to whom the Apostles poured forth their whole doctrine with their blood, where Peter equalled the passion of the Lord, where Paul was crowned with the death of John [i. e. the Baptist], whence the Apostle John, after being dipped in fiery oil and taking no harm, was banished to an island."

16. Caius the presbyter of Rome is reported as saying,

"But I can shew you the trophies of the Apostles: for if you will go to the Vatican or to the Ostian road, you will find the trophies of those who founded this church."

This passage can mean nothing else than that Peter and Paul suffered at Rome, and that either their graves or some memorials of their martyrdom were to be seen on the spot.

17. To these testimonies we may add that of Eusebius himself, who says in more than one place that “Nero was at last uplifted to murder the Apostles, and that Paul is related to have been beheaded at Rome, and Peter to have been crucified also under Nero.”

18. And that of Lactantius :

“When now Nero reigned, Peter came to Rome, and by working certain miracles by the power granted him of God, converted many to righteousness, and confirmed and established the church of God, which being told to Nero, when he found that not only at Rome, but every where, multitudes were daily falling off from the worship of idols, and going over to the new religion in contempt of antiquity; execrable and noxious tyrant as he was, he determined to destroy the heavenly church, and to abolish righteousness; and first of all men becoming persecutor of God’s servants, he crucified Peter, and slew Paul.”

19. In this report later testimonies concur.

In forming an estimate of its trustworthiness, some discrimination is necessary. The whole of that which relates to the earlier visits under Claudius, and the controversy with Simon Magus, fails us, as inconsistent with what we know, or are obliged to infer, from Scripture itself. This being so, is the rest, including the martyrdom at Rome, so connected with this fabulous matter, that it stands or falls with it? When we find in this, as in other matters, that the very earliest Christian writers might and did fall into historical errors which we can now plainly detect and put aside,—when we find so prevalent a tendency even in early times to concentrate events and memorials of interest at Rome, how much are we to adopt, how much to reject, of this testimony to St. Peter’s martyrdom there?

20. These are questions which it would far exceed the limits of this Introduction to discuss, and which moreover do not immediately belong even to collateral considerations regarding our Epistle. They have been very copiously treated, and it seems almost impossible to arrive at even reasonable probability in our ultimate decision upon them. Their own data are perplexing, and still more perplexing matters have been mixed up with them. On the one hand, ancient tradition is almost unanimous: on the other, it witnesses to particulars in which even its earliest and most considerable testimonies must be put aside as inconsistent with known fact. Then again we have on the one hand the patent and unscrupulous perversion of fact to serve a purpose, which has ever been the characteristic of the church of Rome, in her desperate shifts to establish a succession to the fabulous primacy of St. Peter, and on the other the exaggerated partisanship of Protestant writers, with whom the shortest way to save a fact or an interpretation from abuse has been, to demolish it.

21. So that on the whole it seems safest to suspend the judgment with regard to the question of St. Peter's presence and martyrdom at Rome. That he was not there before the date of the Epistle to the Romans (about A.D. 58), we are sure: that he was not there during any part of St. Paul's imprisonment there, we may with certainty infer; that the two apostles did not together found the churches of Corinth and Rome, we may venture safely to affirm: that St. Peter ever was, in any sense like that usually given to the word, Bishop of Rome, is we believe an idea abhorrent from Scripture and from the facts of primitive apostolic history. But that St. Peter travelled to Rome during the persecution under Nero, and there suffered martyrdom with, or nearly at the same time with, St. Paul, is a tradition which does not interfere with any known facts of Scripture or early history, and one which we have no means of disproving, as we have no interest in disproving it.

22. It may be permitted us on this point, until the day when all shall be known, to follow the cherished associations of all Christendom—to trace still in the Mamertine prison and the Vatican the last days on earth of him to whom was committed especially the feeding of the flock of God: to “witness beside the Appian way the scene of the most beautiful of ecclesiastical legends<sup>8</sup>, which records his last vision of his crucified Lord: to overlook from the supposed spot of his death<sup>9</sup> the city of the seven hills: to believe that his last remains repose under the glory of St. Peter's dome<sup>1</sup>.”

SECTION III.

FOR WHAT READERS IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. The inscription of the letter itself has on this point an apparent precision: “to the elect sojourners of the dispersion of Pontus, Galatia, <sup>8</sup> Stanley, Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age, p. 96. The legend referred to is that related by Ambrose, that St. Peter not long before his death, being overcome by the solicitations of the faithful to save himself, was flying from Rome, when he was met by our Lord, and on asking, “Lord, whither goest thou?” received the answer, “I go to be crucified afresh.” On this the Apostle returned and joyfully went to martyrdom. The memory of this legend is yet preserved in Rome by the Church called “Domine, quo vadis?” on the Appian way.

<sup>1</sup> “The remains of St. Peter, as is well known, are supposed to be buried immediately under the great altar in the centre of the famous basilica which bears his name.” Stanley, ib. See in the same work an interesting account of the Judaizing party which gathered round the person of Peter, p. 96 ff.

Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia." This would seem to include the Christians dwelling in those very provinces where St. Paul and his companions had founded churches.

2. But it has been attempted, both in ancient days and in modern, to limit this address to the Jewish Christians resident in those provinces.

3. Still, there is nothing in the words to warrant such a limitation. The term "sojourners" is sufficiently explained in the Epistle itself, in ch. ii. 11, as used in a spiritual sense, strangers and pilgrims on earth: and the term "dispersion" following may well designate the ingrafting of Gentile converts into, and their forming a part of, God's covenant people, who already, according to the flesh, were thus dispersed.

4. With this view well-known facts, both external to the Epistle and belonging to it, agree. These churches, as we learn from the Acts, were composed mainly of Gentile converts: and it would be unreasonable to suppose that St. Peter, with his views on the Christian relation of Jew and Gentile, as shewn in Acts xi. and xv., should have selected out only the Jewish portion of those churches to address in his Epistle. Rather, if one object of the letter were that which I have endeavoured to establish in § v., would he be anxious to mingle together Jew and Gentile in the blessings and obligations of their common faith, and though himself the Apostle of the circumcision, to help on the work and doctrines of the great Apostle of the uncircumcision.

5. And this is further evident from many passages in the Epistle itself. Such is the "not being conformed to the former lusts in your ignorance" (ch. i. 14), words which would hardly be addressed to Jews exclusively, cf. Eph. ii. 1 ff., where the Jews are indeed included in "we all," but Gentiles are mainly addressed: such "those who once were not a people, but are now the people of God" (ii. 10)<sup>2</sup>, as compared with ver. 9, "who called you out of darkness into His marvellous light," and with Rom. ix. 25: such the words, "whose (Sarah's) children ye have become" (iii. 6), implying adoption into the (spiritual) family of Abraham: such the words, "for the time past may suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles, walking in . . . abominable idolatries" (iv. 3), which words are addressed to the readers, and not to be supplied with "us:" and seem decisive as to Gentiles in the main, and not Jews, being designated. The expression of ch. i. 18, "not with corruptible things, silver or gold, were ye redeemed out of your foolish behaviour handed down from your fathers," may seem ambiguous, and has in fact been quoted on both sides: but it seems to me to point the same way as those others: the Apostle would hardly have characterized all that the Jew left to become a Christian by such a name.

6. Steiger has given a list of such churches as would be comprehended under the address in ch. i. 1, Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, Bithynia. The provinces here named proceed in order from N.E. to S. and W.: a circumstance which will be of some interest in our enquiry as to the place of writing<sup>3</sup>. The first of them, PONTUS, stretched from Colchis and Lesser Armenia to the mouth of the river Halys, and was rich both in soil and in commercial towns. It was the country of the Christian Jew Aquila. Next comes GALATIA, to which St. Paul paid two visits (Acts xvi. 6, Gal. iv. 13 ff.: Acts xviii. 23, xix. 1 ff.), founding and confirming churches. After him, his companion Crescens went on a mission there (2 Tim. iv. 10). Its ecclesiastical metropolis was in after time Ancyra. Further particulars respecting it will be found in the Introduction to the Epistle to the Galatians, § ii.

7. Next in order comes CAPPADOCIA, south but returning somewhat to the E., where in after times the towns of Nyssa and Cæsarea gave the church a Gregory and a Basil, and whence (see Acts ii. 9) Jews came up to the feasts in Jerusalem, who might well have carried back the knowledge of Christianity, and have founded churches. Next, going southward and westward, we have proconsular ASIA, including Mysia, Lydia, Caria, Phrygia, Pisidia, and Lycaonia,—containing the churches of Iconium where Paul and Barnabas preached (Acts xiv. 1 ff.), Lysra, the birthplace of Timothy, where St. Paul was stoned by the Jews (Acts xiv. 8—19, xvi. 1, 2; 2 Tim. iii. 11),—Derbe, the birthplace of Caius, where many were made disciples (Acts xiv. 20 f.; xx. 4),—Antioch in Pisidia, where St. Paul converted many Gentiles, but was driven out by the Jews (Acts xiii. 14 ff., 48 ff.): returned however, and confirmed the churches (ib. xiv. 21—23),—then Miletus, on the Carian coast, where from Acts xx. 17, 2 Tim. iv. 20, there must have been Christian brethren,—Phrygia, where St. Paul preached on both his journeys to Galatia (Acts xvi. 6, xviii. 23),—then along the banks of the Lycus, Laodicea, Hierapolis, and Colossæ, celebrated Christian churches, to which he wrote his Colossian Epistle, whose leaders Archippus and Epaphras,—whose member Onesimus are well known to us (Col. i. 7, iv. 9, 12 f., 17; Philem. 2, 10),—where erroneous doctrines and lukewarmness in the faith soon became prevalent (Col. ii., Rev. iii. 14—22).

8. Then passing westward, we find in Lydia at the foot of the Tmolus, Philadelphia, known to us favourably from Rev. iii. 7 ff., and Sardis the capital (Rev. iii. 1 ff.), and Thyatira, blamed in Rev. ii. 18 ff. as too favourably inclined towards false teachers: then on the coast the famous Ephesus, where first St. Paul (Acts xviii. 19), then perhaps Aquila and Priscilla, then Apollos (Acts xviii. 24—28), taught, then St. Paul returned and remained “a whole three years” building up the church with such success (Acts xx. 17: xix. 1 ff., 8—10, 17),—a church well known and loved by every Christian reader of the Epistle to the Ephesians, but grieved over when we read (Rev. ii. 4) that it had deserted its first love. Then northwards we have Smyrna, known favourably to us from Rev. ii. 8 ff., and in Mysia, Pergamus (Rev. ii. 12 ff.); and lastly Alexandria Troas, whence St. Paul was summoned over by a vision to preach in Europe, where afterwards he preached, and raised Eutychus to life (Acts xx. 6 ff., 2 Cor. ii. 12), and where he was on a subsequent occasion entertained by Carpus (2 Tim. iv. 13).

This closes the list of churches known to us, BITHYNIA containing none whose names are handed down in Scripture.

9. The enquiry as to the then state of these Christian congregations is one which must be here conducted simply on grounds furnished by the Epistle itself. Its effect on the conclusion to which we must come as to the date of the Epistle will be dealt with in a subsequent section.

10. From the Epistle itself then we gather, that in external form and government they were much in the same state as when St. Paul exhorted the Ephesian elders at Miletus in Acts xx. Here (ch. v. 1 ff.), as there, the elders are exhorted to tend the church or flock of God: and no other officers in either place appear.

11. It was manifestly during a time of persecution that the Apostle thus addressed them. His expressions, especially those in ch. iii. 17, iv. 12—19, can hardly be interpreted of the general liability of Christians to persecutions, but must necessarily be understood of some trial of that kind then pressing on them<sup>4</sup>.

12. It would seem by ch. iv. 4, 5, that some of these trials had befallen the Christians on account of their separating themselves from the licentious shows and amusements of the heathen. And the same passage will shew that it was from heathens, rather than from unbelieving Jews, that the trials came.

13. We may gather, from hints dropped in the course of the Epistle, that there were in the internal state of the churches some tendencies which required repression, as e. g., the disposition to become identified with the heathen way of living (ch. ii. 11, 12, 16 al.),—that to greed and ambition and self-exaltation on the part of the presbyters (v. 2, 3),—that to evil thoughts and evil words towards one another (ii. 1; iii. 8—12; iv. 9).

SECTION IV.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.

1. The former of these enquiries is very closely connected with that of the last section. Many Commentators have fancied that the state of the readers implied in the Epistle points at the persecution under Nero as the time when it was written: others, that the persecution under Trajan is rather indicated. But to both of these it has been sufficiently replied, that the passages relied on do not warrant either inference: that the defence (apology) to be rendered (ch. iii. 15), is not necessarily, nor indeed well can be at all, a public defence in court, seeing that they are to be ready to make it “to every one that asketh,” &c.: that the suffering as evil doers cannot be well connected with the expression malefactors in Tacitus, because in the Epistle the readers are exhorted to live down the ill repute, which, had it consisted in the mere name of Christian, they could not have been. Again it is answered that we have no proof of the Neronian persecution having extended itself into the Asiatic provinces.

2. On the whole it seems to me that we are not justified in connecting the Epistle with either of these persecutions, but are rather to take its notices as pointing to a time when a general dislike of the Christians was beginning to pass into active tyranny, and in some cases into infliction of capital punishment. As Davidson remarks, “The trials were not yet excessive. They were alarming in the future. A severe time was approaching. Judgment was soon to begin at the house of God. The terrible persecutions and sufferings which the Christians were about to endure, were impending.”

3. These remarks are favoured by the tone in which suffering is spoken of, as by no means a matter of course: not sure, nor even likely, to follow upon a harmless Christian life: compare ch. iii. 13, 14, where, by “who shall harm you if ye be imitators of that which is good?” it seems as if the good liver was in general likely to be let alone; and by what follows, “but even if ye suffer for righteousness’ sake, happy are ye,” it is implied that in some exceptional cases, Christians might be hunted out by zealous enemies and made to suffer quoad Christians.

4. So that I should be disposed, judging from the internal notices given of the state of the readers, to place the writing of the Epistle during the later years of Nero, but before the persecution related by Tacitus broke out. The “hatred of all mankind” which justified that victimizing of the Christians, was gathering and producing its anticipatory fruits here and there, wherever circumstances were favourable.

5. And with this agree the personal notices in our Epistle, and inferences to be gathered from it. We must conclude from passages in it that St. Peter was acquainted with the Epistles of St. Paul; not only with his earlier ones, but with those written during his first Roman imprisonment<sup>5</sup>. If now St. Paul was set free from that imprisonment in the year 63 (see Introduction to the Pastoral Epistles, § ii. 24), this Epistle cannot well have been written before the end of that year.

6. Another personal notice also agrees with this date. By ch. v. 13 we find that Mark was, at the time of its writing, with the Apostle in Babylon, which I here by anticipation assume to be the well-known city in Chaldea. Now from Coloss. iv. 10, we learn that Mark was at the time of writing that Epistle (61—63) with St. Paul in Rome, but intending to journey into Asia Minor: and from 2 Tim. iv. 11 (67 or 68), we find that he was in Asia Minor, and was to be brought with Timotheus to Rome. Now one of two contingencies is possible. Mark may either have spent some of the interval between these two notices with St. Peter in Babylon, or have betaken himself to that Apostle after the death of St. Paul.

7. Of these two alternatives, it is urged by the advocates of the usual view taken of our Epistle that the latter is the more probable. This Epistle is addressed to churches mostly founded by St. Paul: is it probable that St. Peter would have thus addressed them during the great Apostle's lifetime? When we consider St. Paul's own rule, of not encroaching on other men's labours (Rom. xv. 20), and put together with it the fact of the compact made between the two Apostles as related in Gal. ii. 9, it seems difficult to imagine that such an Epistle should have been written before St. Paul was withdrawn from his labours; which latter took place only at his death. That event, and the strengthening of the influences adverse to St. Paul's doctrine consequent on it, might well agree with the testimony to that doctrine which we find in this Epistle, and especially in ch. v. 12.

8. According to this view, we must place the Epistle late in the second apostolic period. We have seen in the Introduction to the Pastoral Epistles, that it is not easy to assign a date for the death of St. Paul before the last year of Nero, i. e. 67 to 68. If we suffer ourselves to be guided by these considerations, we should say, that in the latter part of that year, or the beginning of the next, our Epistle may have been written.

9. But these considerations, forcible as they seem, bring us into a greater difficulty than that of believing the Epistle to have been written during St. Paul's lifetime. They leave absolutely no room for the journey of St. Peter to, and martyrdom at, Rome: none for the writing of the second Epistle, which clearly must not be rejected on such grounds alone. We must therefore adopt the other alternative, and suppose the writing to have taken place during a temporary withdrawal of the great Apostle to some other and distant scene of missionary action between the years 63 and 67.

10. Next as to the place, whence it was written. If words are to be taken literally, this is pointed out with sufficient plainness in the Epistle itself (ch. v. 13), where we read, "She that is elected together with you in Babylon saluteth you," as being BABYLON.

And there does not appear to be any reason to depart from the primâ facie impression given by this notice, that St. Peter was at that time dwelling and working at the renowned Babylon on the Euphrates.

11. It is true, that from very early times the name has suggested other interpretations. Eusebius quotes with "they say," and alleges for it generally the authority of Papias and Clement of Alexandria, "that Peter mentions Mark in his first Epistle, which they say he wrote in Rome itself, and that he signifies this by calling that city, figuratively, Babylon." And so also Œcumenius, assigning however a very insufficient reason: "He calls Rome Babylon on account of its eminent notoriety, which Babylon also possessed for a long time." And Jerome, in the same words as Eusebius above; and elsewhere, commenting on Isa. xlvii., he says that Babylon here is thought by some to mean Rome, as in the Apocalypse of St. John, and in the Epistle of Peter. So also Isidore of Seville. And this has been a very general opinion among not only Roman-Catholic but also other Commentators.

12. But there seems to be no other defence for this interpretation than that of prescription. And it is now pretty generally recognized among Commentators that we are not to find an allegorical meaning in a proper name thus simply used in the midst of simple and matter-of-fact sayings. The personal notice too, conveyed in "she that is elected together with you," will hardly bear the violence which many have attempted to put upon it, in supplying a church for the subject. No such word has been mentioned: nor is the Epistle addressed to the churches of the dispersion, but to the elect sojourners of the dispersion. And as those are individual Christians, so it is but reasonable to believe that this is an individual also, the term being strictly correlative with that other: and if an individual, then that "sister-wife" whom, as we know from 1 Cor. ix. 5, St. Peter carried about in his missionary journeys.

13. And this being so, I can see no objection arising from "in Babylon" being inserted. The Apostle, in ch. i. 1, had seen fit to localize the Christians whom he was addressing: and he now sends them greeting from one whom indeed he does not name, but designates by an expression also local. To the elect Christians of the dispersion of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, he sends greeting from their sister, an elect Christian woman in Babylon. There might obviously be a reason why he should thus designate her, rather than by her name and relation to himself: but no reason whatever why he should go out of his way to make an enigma for all future readers, if he meant the Church at Rome by these words.

14. But even when we have taken the words literally, we have not yet got their full solution. Some contend, that an insignificant fort in Egypt, called Babylon, is intended. This appears to be the tradition of the Coptic Church, and it is supported by Le Clere, Mill, Pearson, Calovius, Pott, Burton, and Greswell. The ground seems mainly to be this; that as it is believed that St. Mark preached, after St. Peter's death, in Alexandria and the parts adjacent, so it is likely that those same parts should have been the scene of his former labours with the Apostle.

15. Others again have supposed it to be Ctesiphon on the Tigris, the winter residence of the Parthian kings; or Selencia, both of which seem to have borne the name of Babylon after the declension of the older and more famous city. So (as regards Selencia) Michaelis, who however adduces no proof that it was thus called in the apostolic age.

16. With regard to the probability or otherwise of St. Peter having laboured in the Assyrian Babylon at this time, we may notice, that that city in its decayed state, and its neighbourhood, were inhabited by Jews, long after other inhabitants had deserted it: that, which is sufficient for us, Josephus and Philo describe it as thus inhabited in their time. It is true that in the last years of Caligula, who died in A.D. 41, there was a persecution of the Jews there, in consequence of which very many of them migrated to the new and rising Seleucia; and five years after, a plague further diminished their number. But this does not preclude their increase or return during the twenty years, at least, which intervened between that plague and the writing of our Epistle.

17. It is some corroboration of the view that our Epistle was written from the Assyrian Babylon, to find, that the countries mentioned in the address are enumerated, not as a person in Rome or in Egypt would enumerate them, but in an order proceeding, as has already been noticed, from East to West and South: and also to find that Cosmas Indicopleustes, in the sixth century, quotes the conclusion of our Epistle as a proof of the early progress of the Christian religion without the bounds of the Roman Empire: by which therefore we perceive that by Babylon he did not understand Rome.

18. With regard to any journey of St. Peter to Babylon, as recorded or implied by antiquity, we are quite unfurnished with any other evidence than that deduced from the passage under consideration. And the difficulties which beset the conjunction of the various notices respecting our Apostle remain much the same in amount, whichever way we attempt their solution: whether by forcing the words "in Babylon" to some far-fetched and improbable sense, as has been very generally done, or with Weiss and others assigning an early date to our Epistle, contrary to the plain sense of his own words, and the common-sense inferences from the indications furnished by it. That St. Peter wrote this Epistle to churches in Asia Minor mainly consisting of Gentile converts: that those churches had been previously the scene of the labours of St. Paul and his companions: that he wrote from Babylon in Assyria, and at a time subsequent to St. Paul's missionary agency: these are points which can hardly be controverted, consistently with the plain acceptation of language in its obvious and ordinary meaning. That the same Apostle visited Rome and suffered martyrdom there, we would fain believe as the testimony of Christian antiquity. It is difficult to believe it: difficult to assign the time so as to satisfy its requisitions: but in the uncertainty which rests over all the later movements of the great Apostles, it would be presumption for us to pronounce it impossible. There may be means of reconciling the two beliefs, of which we are not aware. And since this may be so, we are not unreasonable in retaining both, both being reasonably attested.

19. One personal notice has not been mentioned in the foregoing paragraphs, viz. that of Silvanus having been the bearer of the Epistle (ch. v. 12). And the reason for its omission has been, that it is far too uncertain to found any argument on as to date or locality. Even assuming him to be the same person as the Silas of Acts xv. 22, 32, 40; xvi. 19, 25; xvii. 4, 10, 14; xviii. 5, or the Silvanus of 1 Thess. i. 1, 2 Thess. i. 1, 2 Cor. i. 19,—we know absolutely nothing of his history subsequently to that period of his companionship with St. Paul, and all that is founded on any filling up of the gap in his history can only tend to mislead, by giving to baseless conjecture the value of real fact.

SECTION V.

ITS OBJECT AND CONTENTS.

1. The object of the Epistle is plainly enough announced by the Apostle himself at its conclusion:

"By Silvanus . . . I have written in few words, exhorting and testifying that this is the true grace of God wherein ye stand."

2. But this apparently simple declaration is not easy to track to its meaning in detail. The "exhorting" portion of it involves no difficulty. The frequent exhortations in the Epistle, arising out of present circumstances, are too evident to be missed as being referred to by this word. And when we come to the "testifying" portion, our difficulty is not indeed to find matter in the Epistle to which this may refer, but to identify the meaning of this, to which, as being the "true grace of God," the Apostle's testimony is given. The testimonies in the Epistle are plainly those constant references of practice to Christian doctrine with which every exhortation terminates: being sometimes Old Test. citations, sometimes reminders of facts in the evangelic history, sometimes assertions of the great hope which is reserved for God's elect.

3. Here there can be but little doubt: exhortation and testimony alternate with and interpenetrate one another throughout the whole. It is only when we come to assign a meaning to the word this, further specified as it is by the expression "in which ye stand," that the real definition of the object of the Epistle comes before us, and with it, all its uncertainty and difficulty. What is this grace of God in which the readers were to stand—or rather, into which they had been introduced as their safe standing ground? Obviously in the answer to this question is contained the Apostle's motive for writing.

4. And as obviously, this answer is not to be found within the limits of the Epistle itself. For no such complete setting forth of Christian doctrine is found in it, as might be referred to in such terms: only a continual reminding, an additional testimony (so the word literally means), a bearing testimony to something previously known, received, and stood in, with such expressions as "knowing that," and such assertions as "whom not having seen ye love," and frequent repetitions of because and for, as falling back on previously known truths.

5. And this is further shewn by the words "in which ye stand," referring to a body of doctrinal teaching in which the readers had been grounded. Compare the parallel, which surely is not fortuitous, in 1 Cor. xv. 1: "The Gospel which I preached unto you, which ye also received, in which ye also stand,"—and our assurance that such a reference is intended will be further confirmed.

6. But to what body of doctrine does the Apostle refer? Clearly not to one imparted by himself. There is not the remotest hint in the Epistle of his ever having been among the "elect sojourners" whom he addresses. As clearly again, not to one fortuitously picked up here and there: the allusions are too marked, the terms used throughout the Epistle too definite for this to be the case. It was not merely the Pentecostal message in its simplicity which these readers had received, nor are they to be sought in the earlier and less definite times of Christian teaching,—nor was the object of writing only general edification: there had been a previous building of them up, a general type of Christian doctrine delivered to them: and it was to confirm this mainly that the Apostle writes to them, exhorting them to holy practice, and “stirring up their pure minds by way of remembrance.”

7. It is hardly needful, after what has been already said respecting the churches addressed, to repeat, that this body of Christian teaching I believe to have been that delivered to them by St. Paul and his companions, and still taught among them after his decease by those who had heard him and were watering where he had planted. All the acuteness of such writers as Weiss, who maintain the negative to this, has only the more convinced me that the view is the right and only tenable one.

8. That St. Peter follows out the object not in a spirit dependent on St. Paul’s teaching; that he uses, not the expressions and thoughts of that Apostle, but his own, is no more than we should expect from his standing, and personal characteristics; and is not for a moment to be adduced as against the view here maintained, that his object was to build up and establish those churches which had been founded and fostered under the Apostle of the Gentiles. This will be further elucidated in the next section.

9. The contents of the Epistle are summarily but lucidly given by Steiger; which he prefaces by this remark: “It is not easy to give a logically arranged table of the contents, in a case where the Writer himself does not lay down an abstract division of his subject with a main and subordinate plan, but goes from one idea to another, not indeed with violent transitions, but still not according to logical connexion, only according to that of the subjects themselves. Besides, the changes are in general so imperceptibly made, that we can hardly tell when we are approaching them.”

10. He then gives the following table:

	ch.	ver.
Address to the elect of the triune God . . . . .	i.	1, 2.
Preciousness of that mercy of God which has thus chosen them to salvation . . . . .		3—5;
manifested even in their temporal trials . . . . .		6—9.
Salvation of which prophets spoke, and which angels desire to look into . . . . .		10—12.
Therefore the duty of enduring hope, and of holiness in the fear of God . . . . .		13—17:
[considering the precious blood paid as the price of their ransom] . . . . .		18—21; and of self-purification [as begotten of God’s eternal word] . . . . .		22—25;
and of growth in the Truth . . . . .	ii.	1—3;
and of building up on Christ as a spiritual priesthood . . . . .		4, 5:

Elders, tend His flock, for His sake . . . . .	v.	1—4 :
younger, be subject : all, be humble . . . . .		5, 6 :
full of trust : watchful : resisting the devil . . . . .		7—9 :
and may He who has graciously called you, after short suffering, strengthen and bless you . . . . .		10, 11.
The bearer and aim of the Epistle : salutations ; concluding blessing . . . . .		12—14.

SECTION VI.

CHARACTER AND STYLE.

1. Some Commentators who have impugned the genuineness of our Epistle, have objected to it a want of distinctive character, and have alleged that it is less the work of an individual mind than a series of compilations from the works of others, mainly St. Paul and St. James.

2. This however has been distinctly, and as it seems to me successfully denied by others, and especially by Weiss in his work on the Epistle. It is hardly possible for an unprejudiced person to help tracing in the character of it marks of individuality, and a peculiar type of apprehension of Christian doctrine. That St. Peter was well acquainted with St.

Paul's teaching is certain, not from this Epistle only, but from the latter Apostle's own declaration in Gal. ii. 2, where he says, "I imparted to them the gospel which I preach among the Gentiles, but privately to those of note," of whom St. Peter certainly was one. That he had seen, and was familiar with, many of St. Paul's Epistles, is equally undeniable<sup>6</sup>. The coincidences in peculiar expression and sequence of thoughts are too marked to be accounted for by any participation in common forms of teaching and thinking, even had this latter been the case, which it was not. The coincidences now before us are of an entirely different nature from those in the Epistle to the Hebrews, with the exception perhaps of that one where an Old Test. citation is apparently taken from the Epistle to the Romans.

3. If we seek for tokens of individual character and independence, we shall find them at every turn. Such are, for instance, the designation of the whole Christian revelation as "the grace of God," and treatment of it as such, which prevails throughout the Epistle. Compare ch. i. 3, where it is described as the power of regeneration: i. 10, where it is the salvation promised by the prophets: ii. 19, where it breaks forth even in sufferings: iv. 10, where it is distributed in spiritual gifts: v. 10, where it is the pledge of continued divine help: iii. 7, where it is itself the inheritance of life: i. 13, where it is the material of the revelation of Christ at His coming. And connected with this same, is the way in which 1) God's acts of grace are ever brought forward: e. g. i. 20, His foreordination of Christ: v. 10, i. 15, ii. 9, His call of His people: i. 3, 23, His new-begetting of them by His word through Christ's Resurrection: iv. 14, the resting of His Spirit on them: iv. 11, i. 5, v. 6, 10, His care for them in ministering strength to them, and guarding them by His power to salvation: and 2) the connexion between God and His people insisted on: e. g., ii. 9, 10; iv. 17, v. 2, generally: iii. 21, where Baptism is "an enquiry towards God:" ii. 19, where "conscience of God," an expression nowhere else found, is a motive for enduring sufferings: iv. 11, where His glory is the ultimate motive of Christian action.

4. And in accordance with this constant setting forth of the reciprocal relation of God and His people, we find our Blessed Lord ever introduced as the Mediator: e. g. of things objective, as i. 3, of Regeneration;

<sup>6</sup> The following are a few of the most remarkable parallel passages: The address, as compared with that of Rom., 1 Cor., 2 Cor., &c.: ch. i. 5, with Gal. iii. 23: i. 21, with Rom. iv. 24: ii. 1, with Col. iii. 8 (James i. 21): ii. 6, with Rom. ix. 33 (x. 11): ii. 13, 14, with Rom. xiii. 1—4: ii. 16, with Gal. v. 13: ii. 18, with Eph. vi. 5, Col. iii. 22: ii. 21, with Rom. vi. 18: iii. 1 ff., with Eph. v. 22, 1 Tim. ii. 9, 1 Thess. iv. 4: iii. 8, 9, with Rom. xii. 10 ff.: iii. 22, with Rom. viii. 34, Eph. i. 21, 22: iv. 1, 2, with Rom. vi. 7: iv. 10, 11, with Rom. xii. 6—8: v. 1, with Rom. viii. 18: v. 8, with 1 Thess. v. 6: v. 10, 11, with (Heb. xiii. 20, 21) Phil. iv. 19, 20: v. 14, with Rom. xvi. 16, 1 Cor. xvi. 20, 1 Thess. v. 26.

iii. 21, of Baptism: of things subjective, as i. 21, of faith and hope; ii. 5, of acceptable works for God; iv. 11, of the power to glorify God. The central point of this mediatorial work is His Resurrection, i. 3, iii. 21; in subordination to which the other facts of Redemption are introduced, even where they occur without any necessary reference to it, as e. g., i. 11, 19—21, iii. 18, ii. 24, 25. And those particulars of Christ's agency are principally brought forward, which are connected with the Resurrection; e. g., His preaching to the imprisoned spirits, iii. 19 ff.; His Ascension, iii. 22; His lordship over His people, ii. 25; His future Revelation, i. 7, 13, and that with judgment, iv. 5. Every where it is less the historical Christ, than the exalted Christ of the present and of the future, that is before the Apostle; the Eternal One, i. 11, ii. 25. Even where His sufferings are mentioned, it is ever "Christ," or "the Christ:" not so much the humiliated One, as the glorified and anointed One of God, ii. 21; iii. 18 f.; iv. 1, 13. And this, partly because their present belief on Him, not their past experience or knowledge of Him, is that which is emphasized, i. 8; partly for the reason next to be noticed.

5. Another original and peculiar feature of our Epistle is, its constant reference and forward look to the future. This has been indeed by some exaggerated: as, e. g., Mayerhoff. Huther and Luthardt have considered hope as the central idea and subject of the Epistle: and Weiss adopts for St. Peter the title of the Apostle of hope. But the fact itself is not to be denied. Wherever we consult the Epistle, it is always the future to which the exhortations point: whether we regard the sufferings of Christ Himself, as pointing on to future glory, i. 11, iv. 13; or those of His followers, i. 6, 7, 9. Salvation itself is "the end of faith," i. 9; is the object of living (i. 3) and certain (i. 13) hope, i. 3, 13, 21, iii. 15. The same expectation appears as expressed in "honour," ii. 7; "life," iii. 10 (compare i. 3); "glory," v. 4, 10: and as a constantly present motive, ii. 2; v. 4. The nearness of this future blessedness throws the present life into the background, so that God's people are "strangers" and "sojourners," i. 1, 17; ii. 11. This is ever before the Apostle; both in reference to his readers, iv. 13, and to himself, v. 1.

6. Brückner, from whom in the main the foregoing remarks have been adopted, and who goes much further into detail in following out the same, lays stress on several interesting points of individual peculiarity, even where the modes of speech of St. Paul appear to be adopted by St. Peter; e. g., in the comparison of our ch. ii. 24 with Rom. vi. 8—14, where St. Paul's "living to God" would have been equally available for St. Peter, who uses "living to righteousness," which on account of the close comparison with Christ in St. Paul, would not have been so apposite for him: where again the "dying to sin" (a different word) of St. Paul is not adopted by St. Peter, though quite as well adapted to his purpose as

"to cease-to-live to sin," which he has used. In St. Paul, the death to sin is more a consequence of our union with Christ: in St. Peter, of Christ's having done away sin. The latter, as in other places, approaches nearer to St. John's form of thought and diction.

7. He shews the same with regard to the idea of the Christian calling of God: to that of "hope;" of "obedience;" of Christian liberty, as in the one Apostle (Gal. v. 13) the occasion, in the other the cloke of sin (ch. ii. 16), and besides found in James i. 25, ii. 12, and in John viii. 36: to that of the spiritual gifts; of the Christian reward; and several other cases which at first sight seem alike. In all these there is reason to believe that our Apostle, though speaking sometimes exceedingly like St. Paul and possibly from reminiscence of his Epistles, yet drew from another fountain within himself, and had a treasure of spiritual knowledge and holy inspiration distinct from that of St. Paul, incorporated with his own individual habits of thought.

8. And this is confirmed by observing, that it is not with St. Paul only that such affinities are found, but as before observed, with St. John, and with other of the New Test. writers<sup>7</sup>. And by seeing, that in many expressions St. Peter stands quite alone.<sup>8</sup> Add to which, that in several glimpses, which in the course of treatment of other subjects he gives us, of things mysterious and unknown, we evidently see that such revelations come from a storehouse of divine knowledge, which could reveal much more, had it seemed good to Him by whom the hand and thoughts of the Apostle were guided<sup>9</sup>.

9. As regards the style of our Epistle it has an unmistakeable and distinctive character of its own<sup>1</sup>, arising very much from the mixed <sup>7</sup> Compare ch. i. 23 with 1 John iii. 9: i. 22 (ii. 2) with 1 John iii. 3: ii. 24 with 1 John iii. 7: iii. 13 with 3 John 11: v. 2 with John x. 16: iii. 18 with 1 John ii. 1, iii. 7: i. 19 with John i. 29: iv. 2 with 1 John ii. 16 f.: ii. 24 with Heb. ix. 28, 1 John iii. 5: i. 2 with Heb. xii. 24: v. 4 with Heb. xiii. 20: iii. 18 with Heb. ix. 28: ii. 5 with Heb. xiii. 15. In almost all of the supposed imitations of St. James, Old Test. citations are the material which forms ground common to both Apostles. This is the case with i. 6 f. compared with James i. 2: i. 24 with James i. 10: v. 5 with James iv. 6, 10: iv. 8 with James v. 20.

<sup>8</sup> As e. g. "gone to heaven," ch. iii. 22: "a kiss of love," v. 14: "conscience of God," ii. 19: "living hope," i. 3: "an inheritance, incorruptible, undefiled, unfading," ib. 4. See a copious list given in Davidson, p. 386.

<sup>9</sup> See ch. i. 10, 11; iii. 10, 21; iv. 6, 17; v. 1, 8.

<sup>1</sup> The similarity between the diction of the Epistle and St. Peter's recorded speeches in the Acts, has been often noticed. Compare 1 Pet. ii. 7 with Acts iv. 11: i. 12 with Acts v. 32: ii. 24 with Acts v. 30, x. 39: v. 1 with Acts ii. 32, iii. 15: i. 10 with Acts iii. 13, x. 43: i. 21 with Acts iii. 15, x. 40: iv. 5 with Acts x. 42: i. 21 with Acts iii. 16: ii. 24 with Acts iii. 19, 26. In connexion of sentence with sentence also (see below par. 10) there is great similarity: compare Acts iii. 21, "Christ Jesus, whom it behoves . . . of all things which He spoke . . ." besides the same spirit, and view of the Gospel facts and announcements, being manifest throughout. Compare nature of the contents, and the fervid and at the same time practical rather than dialectical spirit of its Writer. There is in it no logical inference, properly so called: no evolving of one thought from another. The word "wherefore" occurs only in connexion with imperatives introducing practical inferences: "because" only as substantiating motives to Christian practice by Scripture citation or by sacred facts: "for" mostly in similar connexions. The link between one idea and another is found not in any progress of unfolding thought or argument, but in the last word of the foregoing sentence, which is taken up and followed out in the new one<sup>2</sup>.

10. It has been noticed that the same thought is often repeated again, and in nearly the same words. This is consistent with the fervid and earnest spirit of the Apostle: which however, as might be expected from what we know of him, was chastened by a sense of his own weakness and need of divine upholding grace. There is no Epistle in the sacred Canon, the language and spirit of which come more directly home to the personal trials and wants and weaknesses of the Christian life. Its affectionate warnings and strong consolation have ever been treasured up close to the hearts of the weary and heavy-laden but onward-pressing servants of God. The mind of our Father towards us, the aspect of our blessed Lord as presented to us, the preparation by sufferings for our heavenly inheritance, all these as here set forth, are peculiarly lovely and encouraging. And the motives to holy purity spring direct out of the simple and childlike recognition of the will of our Heavenly Father to bring us to His glory.

11. All who have worthily commented on the Epistle have spoken in similar strains of its character and style. "Wonderful is the gravity and alacrity of Peter's discourse, most agreeably holding the reader's attention," says Bengel. "This Epistle has the vehemence agreeable to the disposition of the chief of the Apostles," says Grotius. And Erasmus calls it "an Epistle quite worthy of the chief of the Apostles, full of apostolical authority and dignity, sparing in words, fertile in thoughts, &c." And recently Wiesinger sums up thus his characteristic of the Epistle: "Certainly, it entirely agrees in tone and feeling with what we have before said of the character of the Apostle. His warm self-devotion to the Lord, his practical piety and his active disposition, are all reflected in it. How full is his heart of the hope of the revelation of the Lord ! With what earnestness does he exhort his readers to lift their eyes above the sufferings of the present to this future glory, and in hope of it to stand firm against all temptation ! He who in loving impatience cast himself into the sea to meet the Lord, is also the man who most earnestly testifies to the hope of His return :—he who dated his own faith from the sufferings of his Master, is never weary in holding up the suffering form of the Lord before the eyes of his readers to comfort and stimulate them :—he before whom the death of a martyr is in assured expectation, is the man who most thoroughly, and in the greatest variety of aspects, sets forth the duty and the power, as well as the consolation, of suffering for Christ. If we had not known from whom the Epistle comes, we must have said, It must be a Rock of the church who thus writes : a man whose own soul rests on the living Rock, and who here, with the strength of his testimony, takes in hand to secure the souls of others, and against the harassing storm of present tribulation to ground them on the true Rock of ages.” The whole may be summed up by saying, that the entire Epistle is the following out of our Lord’s command to its Writer, “And thou, when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren !”

e. g. the summary of that part of his first speech which is not recorded, "save yourselves from this crooked generation," Acts ii. 40, with the frequent exhortations in our Epistle to separation from the heathen world.

<sup>2</sup> See e. g. ch. i. ver. 4, "you" . . . . ver. 5, "who are" . . . . ver. 8, "whom" . . . . ver. 9, "salvation" . . . . ver. 10, "of which the prophets" . . . . ver. 12, "unto whom" . . . . &c., &c. And so we might proceed through the Epistle.

It will be observed that I have throughout this chapter abstained from introducing considerations and comparisons of the Second Epistle of St. Peter. I have done this, because I wished to keep the first Epistle clear of all the doubt and difficulty which surround the treatment of the other, which I have reserved entire for the following chapter.

<sup>4</sup> I cannot forbear, as caring above all for the spiritual life in God of the students of His holy word, recommending to them most strongly the commentary of our own Archbishop Leighton, as a devotional subsidiary to their critical and exegetical studies of this Epistle. To the mere scholar, it may not present much matter of interest ; but to one who wishes that the mind of God’s Spirit, speaking in the Apostle, may live and grow within his own breast, no writer on Scripture that I know furnishes a more valuable help than Leighton.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE SECOND EPISTLE GENERAL OF PETER.

SECTION I.

OBJECT, CONTENTS, AND OCCASION OF THE EPISTLE.

1. I THINK it best to approach the difficult question of the genuineness of this Epistle, by a consideration of the internal characteristics of the writing itself.

2. Its general object is nowhere so distinctly declared, as that of 1 Peter in v. 12 (ch. iii. 1, 2 being special). But the two concluding verses contain in them the double aim which has been apparent through the whole. In iii. 17 we read, "Knowing before, take heed lest ye being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness," and in iii. 18, "Grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." These two, the prohibitory and the hortatory, are the objects of the Epistle. The former is the introduction to the latter, which, as might be expected, is the main and ultimate aim.

3. And this ultimate aim is apparent from the very beginning. Ch. i. 1—11 is devoted to fervent enforcing of it. Then i. 12—21, laying down the grounds on which the "knowledge" rests, viz. apostolic testimony and prophetic announcement, forms a transition to the description, ch. ii., of the false prophets and teachers who were even then coming in, and should wax onward in activity and influence. Then in ch. iii., the further error of false teachers in scorning and disbelieving the promise of the coming of the Lord is stigmatized and refuted, and the Epistle concludes with a general reference to the Epistles of St. Paul, as teaching these same truths, and as being perverted like the other Scriptures by the ignorant and unstable.

Throughout all, one purpose and one spirit is manifest. The "knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ" is ever the condition of salvation (ch. i. 8; ii. 20; iii. 18). Sometimes we have it on the side of knowledge of the Father who hath called us (i. 2, 3), sometimes on that of knowledge of the gospel as the way of righteousness (ii. 21: compare ii. 2). This knowledge is the central point of the Christian life, both theoretically and practically considered: it is the vehicle of the divine agency in us, and so of our highest participation of God (i. 3, 4): it is the means of escape from the pollutions of the world (ii. 20),—the crowning point of Christian virtues (i. 8),—the means of access into Christ's kingdom (i. 11).

And the side of our Lord's own Person and Office on which attention is fixed is not so much His historical life, as His "might" and "authority" in His exalted state of triumph (i. 16). The promises which are introduced refer to His second coming and kingdom (i. 4; iii. 4, 13).

4. And in this peculiar setting forth of the Christian life must we look for the necessary bringing out of the dangers of seduction by false teachers, and the placing of this knowledge and these promises over against it. The "false teachers" (ii. 1; "lawless men," iii. 17) are described partly theoretically, as denying the lordship of our glorified Saviour which He has won by Redemption (ii. 1, contrasted with His might, i. 16), and His promise of coming again (iii. 1 ff., contrasted with His presence, i. 16),—partly practically,—as slandering God's way of righteousness (ii. 2) and His majesty (ii. 10 ff.),—as disgracing their profession of Christian freedom (ii. 19),—as degraded by a vicious life (ii. 13),—full of lust and covetousness (ii. 14),—speaking swelling words (ii. 18), deserters of the right way (ii. 15 ff.), traitors (ii. 17), seducing the unstable (ii. 14, 18),—the objects of God's inevitable judgment (ii. 3—9, 17),—preparing destruction for themselves (ii. 12, 19), and the more so, because their guilt is increased by the sin of apostasy (ii. 20—22).

5. In strong contrast and counterpoise against both sides of this heretical error stands their knowledge: against the former of them, in its theoretical aspect, as the right knowledge of the power and coming of Christ (i. 16: see above): against the latter, in its practical, as insight into the way of righteousness. This latter contrast is ever brought up in the description of the false teachers in ch. ii. Noah, as an herald of righteousness, is excepted from the judgment of the Flood (ii. 5): Lot, as "righteous," from that of Sodom (ii. 7, 8): God knows how to punish the "unrighteous," and rescue the "godly" (ii. 9): the heretics are described as having left the "straight way" (ii. 15), and the example of Balaam applied to them (ii. 15, 16). And accordingly it is the "knowledge of Jesus Christ" which is to preserve the readers from "corruption" (i. 4; cf. ii. 12), and from falling away (i. 10).

6. This main subject of the Epistle, which not only occasions the minute depiction of the adversaries, but also keeps together the whole, is, notwithstanding the parenthetical allusions and polemical digressions, in close coherence. The later portions are all based on the earlier. Thus ch. i. 16 ff. is the foundation of ii. 1 ff., iii. 1 ff.: thus the conclusion is in intimate connexion with the opening, the same union of "knowledge," "grace," and "peace," being found in both (i. 2; iii. 14, 18): thus the words, "that ye fall not from your own stedfastness," iii. 17, refer back to i. 10, 12: thus the conditioning clause, "having escaped the corruption which is in the world through lust," i. 4, is remembered in the warning "beware lest, being led away together with the error" of the wicked," &c., iii. 17; and the more detailed exhortation of i. 5—8 is compressed together in the shorter "but grow in grace," &c., of iii. 17. Thus also the qualifying expression, "in the righteousness," ch. i. 1, is borne in mind in ii. 21 and iii. 13. So again, iii. 1 takes up again i. 13, and the words "by the holy prophets" of iii. 2, refer back to i. 19. In fact, the contents of this short Epistle are bound together by the closest and most intimate connexion and coherence.

7. The above notices will make sufficiently plain the occasion of the Epistle. It was, the prompting of a holy desire to build up and confirm the readers, in especial reference to certain destructive forms of error in doctrine and practice which were then appearing and would continue to wax onward.

8. If we seek to fix historically the heretics here marked out, we find the same difficulty as ever besets similar enquiries in the apostolic Epistles. They are rather the germs of heresies that are described, than the heresies themselves as known to us in their ripeness afterwards. These germs ever found their first expansion in the denial of those distinctive doctrines of the Gospel which most closely involve Christian practice and ensure Christian watchfulness. First came the loosening of the bands which constrained man by the love of Christ and waiting for Him; then when true liberty was lost, followed the bondage of fanciful theological systems and self-imposed creeds. The living God-man vanished first out of the field of love and hope and obedience, and then His place was taken by the great Tempter and leader captive of souls.

9. So that when we enquire to which known class of subsequent heretics the description in our Epistle applies,—whether to the Carpocratians as Grotius believed, or to the Sadducees, as Bertholdt, or to the Gnostics, or Nicolaitans, as others, the reply in each case must be, that we cannot identify any of these precisely with those here described: that the delineation is both too wide and too narrow for each in succession: but that (and it is an important result for the question of the date of our Epistle) we are here standing at a point higher up than any of these definite names of sects: during the great moral ferment of the first fatal apostasy, which afterwards distributed itself into various divisions and sects.

SECTION II.

FOR WHAT READERS IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. The readers are nowhere expressly defined. By ch. iii. 1, it would appear that they are identical with at all events a portion of those to whom the first Epistle was addressed. And to this the expression of

ch. i. 15, "on each occasion which offers," seems also to point: besides appearing to refer to some previous personal connexion of the Writer with his readers. This latter has frequently been assumed from ch. i. 16; but without necessity; see note there. All that is there assumed is that which is also stated in ch. i. 1, the delivery of the truths and faith of the Gospel to them by competent eye-witnesses, of whom the Writer (in office, but not necessarily in connexion with themselves) had been one.

2. The address, ch. i. 1, is more general than that of the first Epistle: the words of warning and exhortation are for all who bore the Christian name. The dangers described were imminent throughout the then Christian world. And the expressions, whether of praise and encouragement, or of caution, must be taken as generally applicable to all believers in Christ, rather than as descriptive of the peculiar situation of any circle of churches at any one time.

3. Of necessity, the same general view must not be taken of the enemies of the faith here depicted. The city of God, with its bulwarks and towers, is ever the same: this was a special attack beginning to be made on it by a body of foes of a special character. The firmness and watchfulness which seem to be predicated of the readers (ch. i. 12, iii. 17, i. 19) are rather assumptions, certain to be true of true believers, than statements of objective matter of fact: whereas the depravities and errors of the heretics, as far as spoken of in the present, were things actually occurring under the Apostle's notice. This must be borne in mind, or we shall be liable to go wrong in our inference respecting those addressed.

4. On the other hand it must be borne in mind, that the Apostle's field of view, as he looked over the church, would naturally be bounded by the lines which marked out the cycle of his own observation: that those to whom he had before written would be on this second occasion nearest to his thoughts: and by consequence, that when he seems to address these readers as in the main identical with those, this inference must not be carried too far, but allowance made for the margin which may fairly be granted to each Epistle: for expanding the apparent limited character of the former address towards that more general reference which was sure to have been in the Apostle's mind: and for contracting the very wide address of this one merely by believing that in writing he would fix his thoughts on those whom he knew and especially cared for.

5. If it be said, as it has been, that we find no trace, in the former Epistle, of the peculiar kind of adversaries of the faith of whom so much is here said, and on the other hand nothing in this Epistle of the persecutions, which bore so considerable a part in the matters treated in the former one: the answer to both these is exceedingly easy. A very short time would suffice for the springing up, or for the becoming formidable, of these deadly forms of error. As the Apostles were one by one removed by death, on the one hand their personal influence in checking evil tendencies was withdrawn, on the other that coming of Christ, of which they had once confidently spoken as to be in their own time, became in danger of being disbelieved. This would be a sufficient reason for the one supposed difficulty: and as regards the other, it is quite answer enough to say, that this second Epistle being written on a special occasion and for a special object, is, as we have seen, coherently and consistently devoted to that object, and does not, in its course, travel out of its way to speak of things with which the first Epistle was concerned. It is obvious that, supposing the two to have been written by the same person, he is not likely to have dwelt again in his second letter on things already brought forward in his first.

6. Besides, it has been not unjustly thought that we can discover traces in our Epistle of the same characteristics as those which marked the readers of the former one, or of others which would be probably subsequent to them. We have there the caution to take care that none of them suffer as an evil doer, "a murderer," "a thief," "an evil doer," "a busybody in other men's matters" (iv. 15); which seems to contain in it the seed of that further development of evil among Christians, which we find actual in this Epistle. Again the neglect of the caution there, "gird up the loins of your mind, being sober: hope fervently for the grace that is being brought unto you in the revelation of Jesus Christ" (i. 13), would lead exactly to the dissolute lives here described of those who had ceased to hope for his coming. There is close connexion between 1 Pet. ii. 16, "as free, and not as using your liberty for a cloke of your maliciousness" . . . and 2 Pet. ii. 19, "promising them liberty, while they themselves are the slaves of corruption:" between the cautions there given against pride (v. 5—7), and the "speaking great swelling words of vanity" of our ch. ii. 18. And the same analogies might be carried yet further, shewing that from the circumstances of the readers which respectively underlie the one and the other Epistle, this may well have been a sequel to, and consequent on, the former.

SECTION III.

ON THE RELATION BETWEEN THIS EPISTLE AND THAT OF JUDE.

1. It is well known that, besides various scattered resemblances, a long passage occurs, included in the limits Jude vv. 3—19, 2 Peter ii. 1—19, describing in both cases the heretical enemies of the Gospel, couched in terms so similar as to preclude all idea of entire independence. If considerations of human probability are here, as every where else, to be introduced into our estimate of the Sacred Writings, then either one saw and used the text of the other, or both drew from a common document, or a common source of oral apostolic teaching.

2. Setting aside the supposition of a common documentary source, as not answering to the curious phenomena of concurrence and divergence, no one can say that the latter alternative may not have been the case: that a portion of oral teaching spoken originally in the power of the Spirit, may not, in its reproduction, have become deflected as we here see. Were the case in strict analogy with that of the three Gospels, we should have no hesitation in adopting this hypothesis. But the cases are not similar. For we have first to add to the phenomena of this passage the remarkable coincidences elsewhere, where no such common portion of teaching could have been concerned: and then to observe, that the coincidences and divergences in the passage itself do not entirely bear out the hypothesis. There is an intent and consistent purpose plainly visible in them, which is altogether absent, unless the wildest fancies be allowed to come into play, from the common text of passages in the three Gospels.

3. We have then to fall back on the supposition, that one of the Sacred Writers saw and used the text of the other. And if this is to be so, there can be but little hesitation in answering the enquiry, on which side the preference lies as to priority and originality. The grounds of that answer have indeed been amplified and exaggerated, beyond what we can fairly concede: but still in the main they are irrefragable. We cannot see, with De Wette and others, that St. Peter is less fresh or individual in his expressions and turns of thought than St. Jude: but, conceding to both Writers originality and individuality of thought, it is then for us to ascertain by inspection, which text bears the air of being the free outflow of the first thought, which the working up of the other for a purpose slightly differing.

4. The portion of the common matter which will best serve us for this purpose is that in which the traditional and historical examples are adduced, 2 Pet. ii. 1—16; Jude 4—11. In this passage the object of St. Jude is to set forth the “ungodly men who turn the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and deny the only Master, and our Lord Jesus Christ.” The persons described by St. Peter are not the same, in however many common points the characters coincide. With him they are false teachers, answering to the “false prophets among the people” of old: like the others, they are described as “denying the Master [that bought them],” with the words in brackets characteristically inserted. In Peter (ii. 1) we have merely a reminiscence of the first historical notice in Jude (ver. 5), consisting in his specifying the false teachers as answering to the false prophets among the people, as contrasted with the true ones of whom he has been speaking (i. 19—21). It was not to his purpose to mention the destruction of the unbelieving (Jude 5), and therefore he slightly passes this example with a mere allusion. I submit that this will not bear the converse hypothesis: that the weighty and pregnant sentence in St. Jude could not be the result of the passing hint "among the people" of St. Peter, nor can that hint be accounted for except as a reminiscence of St. Jude.

5. Passing to the next example, that of the sinning angels, we find the same even more strikingly exemplified. St. Jude is writing of apostates, and sets forth their fate by that of the angels, "which kept not their proper dignity, but left their own habitation:" in allusion (see note there) to Gen. vi. 2, their going after strange flesh, a sin after the manner of which Sodom and Gomorrah also sinned in after time (Jude 6, note). This special notice, so apposite to St. Jude's subject, is contracted in St. Peter into the mere mention of "the angels which sinned." Here it is most natural to suppose, that the special notice preceded the general.

6. The next example in St. Peter is one exactly to the point for which he is adducing the whole series, viz., to shew God's power both to punish and to deliver, but, on one side at least, inapposite to St. Jude's purpose. It is found in St. Peter alone. But the reason why I adduce it here is, to remark, that, had St. Peter's been the original, St. Jude would have hardly failed to insert in his examples that portion of this one which so exactly tallied with his purpose, "He spared not the old world, . . . bringing in the flood on the world of the ungodly."

7. The next example, that of Sodom and Gomorrah, is found in St. Jude in strict connexion and analogy with that which has immediately preceded it, viz. that of the angels. This connexion is broken in St. Peter, no such particular as that on which it depends being found in his mention of the angels' sin. These cities are adduced only as an example to those who intended to be ungodly, and, which is again noteworthy, the mention of the rescue of Lot is appended, conformably with that which we remarked in the preceding paragraph.

8. It is further to be noticed with respect to this same example, that St. Jude describes the cities as "for an example, suffering the just punishment by eternal fire," whereas St. Peter has resolved this, which might seem to imply the eternity of the fire which consumed those cities, into a fuller and historical account, retaining the feature of their being a warning to the impious: "burning them to ashes, condemned them to be overthrown, laying down an example of those that should in after time live ungodly." Here again I submit that the converse hypothesis is inconceivable.

9. Again, in the description which follows in St. Peter (ver. 9), we have a characteristic continuation of his main subject, the rescue of the righteous united with the punishment of the wicked, and then, with

"but chiefly," he returns to the particular characters here under description, and takes up the two traits which form the main subject in St. Jude, ver. 8; so that we have the original "In like manner nevertheless these dreamers also defile the flesh, despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities," represented by "but chiefly them that go after the flesh in the lust of uncleanness, and despise government. Presumptuous, self-willed, they are not afraid to rail at dignities:" where again I submit that none can doubt for a moment which sacred Writer preceded the other.

10. The next example even more strikingly shews the same. St. Jude cites at length from some apocryphal book, probably that called the taking up or ascension of Moses, an instance of the different conduct of mighty angels in contending with God's adversaries. St. Peter (ver. 11) merely asserts generally that such is the conduct of mighty angels, but gives no hint of an allusion to the fact on which the general assertion is based; nor does the great Adversary appear in his sentence, but in his stead are substituted these heretics themselves; "whereas angels, though they be greater in strength and might, bring not railing judgment against them." This, standing as it does thus by itself, would constitute, were it not for the original in St. Jude being extant, the most enigmatical sentence in the New Testament.

11. I shall not treat at length every separate verse, but shall only remark, that as we pass on through 2 Pet. ii. 12 ff., while this view of the priority of St. Jude is at every step confirmed, we derive some interesting notices of the way in which the passage in our Epistle has been composed: viz. by the Apostle having in his thoughts the passage in St. Jude, and adapting such portions of it as the Spirit guided him to see fit, taking sometimes the mere sound of St. Jude's words to express a different thought, sometimes, as we saw above, contracting and omitting, sometimes expanding and inserting, as suited his purpose. Thus while in St. Jude we have the comparison "as the irrational animals" simply introduced with reference to certain things which the persons under description know naturally and use corruptly, in St. Peter it is the heretics themselves who are "as irrational animals," the additional point of comparison is introduced, that they are born naturally for capture and destruction, and the are corrupted of St. Jude is made to serve a very different purpose,—"shall even perish in their corruption." So in 2 Pet. ii. 13, in the reminiscence of the passage, rocks (spilades) of Jude 12 becomes spots (spiloi) and blemishes,—"in your love-feasts" (agapais) of St. Jude becomes "in their deceits" (apatais). So in 2 Pet. ii. 17, we have somewhat similar figures to those in Jude 13, but whereas originally it was "waves of the sea foaming out their own shame," and "wandering stars, for whom the blackness of darkness is reserved for ever," in the latter text it becomes, more suitably to St. Peter's purpose of depicting false teachers, “wells without water,” and “mists driven by a whirlwind;” for whom “the blackness of darkness is reserved.”

12. In ver. 11, St. Jude, fervidly borne along in his impassioned invective, collects together three instances of Old Test. transgressors, to all of whom he compares those whom he is stigmatizing. They were murderers like Cain, covetous like Balaam, rebellious like Korah. But out of these St. Peter, dealing with false teachers, whom he is comparing with the false prophets of old, selects Balaam only, and goes at length (vv. 15, 16) into his sin and his rebuke. Can any one persuade us that in the impetuous whirlwind of St. Jude’s invective he adopted and abridged the example furnished by St. Peter, prefixing and adding those of Cain and Korah?

SECTION IV.

AUTHENTICITY.

1. As regards the external grounds for or against the authenticity of this Epistle, we have very various opinions. Dietlein<sup>5</sup> finds traces of its use in the earliest apostolic Fathers; in Polycarp, in Ignatius, in the Epistle of Barnabas, in Clement of Rome. Most of these however are very shadowy and fanciful: some of them even absurd. The explanation of the coincidence in these cases is generally to be sought in the fact that these writers had the same sources to draw from, in the main, as the Apostle, viz. Old Test. prophecy, and the common-places of Christian teaching: and this being so, it would be strange indeed if we did not find such coincidence in insulated words and occasional phrases.

2. A few however of the instances adduced from the Apostolic Fathers are worth notice: not as by any means proving the use by them of this Epistle, but as remarkable in connexion with the question before us. Such are 1) Hermas, in the work called “The Shepherd:” “Listen to the weight of both, delicate living and torment. Of delicate living and of self-deception the time is one hour: but of torment the hours each have the force of thirty days. If then a man live delicately, and deceive himself one day, and be tormented one day, &c.,” as compared with “counting as pleasure that delicate living which is but for a day,” 2 Pet. ii. 13, where see note: 2) Clement of Rome: “Noah preached repentance;” and again, “Noah, being found faithful, preached, by his ministration, regeneration to the world:” and again, in speaking of Lot’s deliverance out of Sodom, “The Master made it evident, that He does not desert those who hope in Him, but appoints the backsliders to punishment and torment . . . that it may be known to all that the double-minded and doubters about God's power are for condemnation and for an example to all generations."

3. Neither the Epistle of Barnabas, nor Justin Martyr, nor Theophilus of Antioch, nor Irenæus, can be fairly adduced as citing or alluding to our Epistle. This assertion may surprise the reader who is acquainted with the strong assertions and easy assumptions of Dietlein. But let him take them one by one and examine them strictly and impartially, and he will find them all in succession prove worthless, except as shewing that primitive Christianity had a Greek vocabulary of its own to express its doctrines and convey its exhortations, which the Apostles and their immediate successors used in common. Neither does the ancient fragment known as the canon of Muratori make any mention of our Epistle. Neither does Tertullian, nor Cyprian, nor Clement of Alexandria in any of his extant works.

4. There is a passage in Hippolytus on Antichrist, which seems to be an amplification of 2 Pet. i. 21 ;—speaking of the prophets, he says : "For they spoke not out of their own strength, nor did they proclaim what things they themselves would, but first of all by means of the divine word they reasoned correctly, and then by means of visions they foretold future events rightly, and then with their persuasion they said the things which were revealed to them by God, but hidden from other men." Still, striking as the similarity is, we cannot venture to affirm that the inference is really a sound one, any more than in the case of that place in Theophilus of Antioch : "But men of God, being spiritually borne on by the Holy Spirit, and becoming prophets, inspired and gifted with wisdom by God Himself, were taught of God."

5. Eusebius reports of Clement of Alexandria, "that he in his book called Hypotyposes, made short expositions of all the canonical Scriptures ; not passing over even the disputed books, such as that of Jude, and the rest of the Catholic Epistles, and that of Barnabas, and that called the Apocalypse of Peter." And so also says Cassiodorus, who however seems to assert, in another passage, that these expositions were only of 1 Peter, 1 and 2 John, and James.

6. The judgment between these conflicting testimonies must apparently be given on the side of Eusebius, and Cassiodorus's first assertion. For Eusebius mentions expressly the Epistle of Jude, as one of those on which Clement commented, whereas by the last-cited statement of Cassiodorus it is excluded. Still even thus we have no express mention of our Epistle, but can only include it by inference among the disputed books of which Eusebius speaks.

7. The testimony of Origen appears somewhat ambiguous.

Eusebius reports it thus : "Peter, on whom the Church of Christ is built, over which the gates of hell shall not prevail, has left one acknowledged Epistle : perhaps also a second ; for it is doubted about."

On the other hand, in those works which are extant only in a Latin version, Origen again and again quotes our Epistle as Scripture : e.g. in his Homily on Joshua,—“ For Peter sounds with the two trumpets of his Epistles :” on Leviticus,—“ And again Peter says, ‘ Ye are made partakers of the divine nature ’” (2 Pet. i. 4) : on Numbers,—“ As Scripture saith in a certain place (2 Pet. ii. 16), ‘ The dumb animal speaking with human voice convicted the madness of the prophet.’ ”

8. Perhaps the solution of this is to be found, not by supposing that the translator Rufinus interpolated the passages, but by remembering the loose way in which both Origen himself and others were found to cite the Epistle to the Hebrews : ordinarily, and in course of writing, speaking of it as St. Paul’s, but whenever they wrote deliberately, giving expression to their doubts respecting its authorship. We have only to believe that Origen acted similarly with regard to 2 Peter, and the mystery is at once solved.

In Origen’s extant Greek works, it is true, we nowhere find the Epistle quoted. Nay, it is more than once by implication excluded from the number of the Catholic Epistles. Thus in his Commentary on John, cited above, ch. iii. § i. 7, he cites 1 Pet. iii. 18—21, as being “ in the Catholic Epistle :” and in his passage on the Canon : “ Secondly, that according to Mark, as Peter dictated to him : wherefore also he acknowledges him as his son in his Catholic Epistle.”

9. Firmilian, bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, a disciple of Origen (died 270), certainly alludes to our Epistle, if his words are rightly given in the Latin version in which only we now have them :

“ The blessed Apostles Peter and Paul, who in their Epistles execrated heretics, and admonished us to avoid them.”

Nothing is proved here by “ their Epistles,” as to two Epistles of St. Peter being meant : but by the fact mentioned, this second Epistle must be intended, seeing that it is in this only that heretics are inveighed against by St. Peter.

10. The testimony of Didymus, whose commentary on the Epistle is extant in a Latin version only, is given at the end of his remarks on this Epistle :

“ We must not therefore forget, that this Epistle is accounted spurious, and, although it is currently published, yet is not in the canon.”

Here the Latin expressions cause some little uncertainty, and can only be interpreted by conjecturing what they represent in the original Greek. Undue stress has been laid on the “ therefore,” as if it were a ratiocinative conclusion from something preceding. But in all probability the sentence was a mere concluding notice, and “therefore” was only a rounding off of what had gone before.

11. Eusebius says, “One Epistle of Peter, that which is called the first, is received : this the ancient presbyters use as undoubted in their writings. But that which is called his second we have received as not indeed among the New Testament writings ; but yet, appearing useful to many, it has come to be revered with the other Scriptures :” and afterwards, “So many are the writings which are called Peter’s ; of which I know only one Epistle as genuine, and confessed by the ancient presbyters.” And again : “Of those books which are disputed, but notwithstanding generally known, is that Epistle called James’s, and that of Jude, and the second of Peter<sup>6</sup>.”

12. Jerome says of St. Peter, “He wrote two Epistles, which are named catholic, of which the second is by most denied to be his, on account of the dissonance of its style from the former Epistle.”

“Paul therefore had Titus for his interpreter, as the blessed Peter had Mark, whose Gospel was composed with Peter as narrator, and himself as writer. And the two Epistles which are ascribed to Peter are discrepant in style and character and structure of words ; by which we understand that from necessity of circumstances he used different interpreters.”

13. After the time of Eusebius, the Epistle appears to have been very generally received as canonical. We have however the statement of Gregory of Nazianzum, “that some held seven, some only three catholic Epistles ;” and of Cosmas Indicopleustes, “that among the Syrians only three were found, those of James, Peter, and John.” It confirms this notice to find, that this Epistle is not contained in the Peshito, or early Syriac version. Ephrem Syrus notwithstanding received the whole seven catholic Epistles, and so the Philoxenian, or later Syriac version. Leontius of Byzantium says that Theodore of Mopsuestia rejected our Epistle.

14. In the middle ages the Epistle was generally recognized and accounted canonical. At the time of the Reformation, the ancient doubts revived. Both Erasmus and Calvin express them. Cajetan, Grotius, Scaliger, Salmasius, question its genuineness. And in modern times, Semler, Neander, Credner, De Wette, Reuss, Mayerhoff, have ranged themselves on the same side.

15. On the other hand, there have not been wanting in our own days many defenders of the genuineness of the Epistle. The principal of these have been Michaelis, Pott, Augusti, Storr, Flatt, Dahl, Hug, Schmid, Lardner, Guericke, Windischmann, Thiersch. The same result is evidently to be supplied at the end of Brückner's notices, though he himself hesitates to affirm it. From what has already been said of Dietlein's book, it will be readily believed, that it is hardly worth quoting on this side.

16. If we now come to review the course of ancient testimony, we shall find its tendency to be very much the same as we found it respecting the Epistle of St. James, with which indeed our Epistle is often classed among the disputed books. And as far as this portion of the subject of our present section is concerned, we might append to it the same conclusion as that with which we terminated the corresponding section on that Epistle, ch. xvi. § v. 15.

17. But another department of evidence in this case requires consideration. Weighty objections have, and that from early times<sup>7</sup>, been brought against the Epistle on internal grounds. Some of these I have already dealt with by anticipation, in speaking on its occasion and object,—on the probability as to the same readers being partly in view as those in the former Epistle,—on the kind of use made of the Epistle of St. Jude. If our preceding remarks, which I have endeavoured to make fairly, and not in the spirit of a partisan, have been warranted by fact, then on all these points we have been gathering reasons by which those objections to its genuineness from supposed internal disqualification may be so far met.

18. But they extend to several other points besides those above mentioned. For instance, it is said, that the kind of mention of the coming of our Lord in the two Epistles could not have proceeded from the same person. In the former Epistle it is simply introduced as one of the great comforting assurances for God's persecuted people: in the latter, it is defended against cavil and unbelief. Now would it not have been more just in this case to say, that the circumstances and persons in view cannot be the same, rather than that the Writers cannot? For surely there is nothing in this Epistle shewing a belief, on the part of the Writer himself, inconsistent with that professed in the other. Nay, it is evidently shewn by such passages as ch. iii. 8, 10, that the firm persuasion expressed in 1 Pet. iv. 5 was that of our Writer also.

19. It is said, that the peculiarities with regard to certain uncommon points which we find in the first Epistle (e.g. iii. 19, iv. 6, iii. 6, 21) are not found reproduced in the second. But, as Brückner has well observed, the very fact, that it was characteristic of St. Peter to adduce these mysterious and outlying points, would also account in some measure for their appearing, not always, but in a scattered and irregular manner, as illustrations by the way: just as they do appear in this second Epistle also (e.g. iii. 5, 10). So that this is rather an argument for, than against the identity of the Writers. Besides which, it halts in two essential points. For 1) it is not altogether correct in its statement. We do find the Writer's view of ancient prophecy continued from one Epistle (1 Pet. i. 10—12) to the other (2 Pet. i. 19—21; iii. 2):—the new birth by the divine word, which in the first Epistle is alleged as a motive for putting off worldly lusts and passions (i. 22—ii. 2), reappears in the second in i. 4: the “virtues” of Him who hath called them, 1 Pet. ii. 9, reappear in the same peculiar form, 2 Pet. i. 3: if we read, 1 Pet. iv. 17, that judgment is beginning at the house of God, and will proceed on to the disobedient, we read of the deceivers in the second Epistle, 2 Pet. ii. 3, that their judgment is not idle. Other instances might be and have been produced, shewing that the allegation will not hold. And 2) it is forgotten by the objectors, that it would be only in a spurious Epistle imitating the first, that we should find such reproductions carefully carried out: the occasion and object of a second genuine Epistle being totally different, forms a very sufficient reason why they should not be found to any considerable extent.

20. It is again objected, that whereas in the former Epistle the sufferings and death and resurrection of Christ were brought forward frequently and insisted on,—in this, these facts of Redemption are altogether put into the background, and only the exalted Christ is in the view of the Writer. But it is to be remembered that 1) in that first Epistle we found the exalted Person of our Lord mainly before the Apostle's eyes<sup>8</sup>: that 2) the differing occasion and object would tend to produce just the diversity found here, where there is no longer any purpose of comforting under persecution, but only of warning against error and building up in knowledge: that 3) in the first Epistle, where “salvation” was so conspicuous with its facts and consequences, our Lord is commonly found as “Christ” simply (i. 11, 19; ii. 21; iii. 15, “the Lord Christ”), or “Jesus Christ” (i. 1, 2, 3, 7, 13; ii. 5; iii. 21; iv. 11), or “Christ Jesus” (v. 10); whereas in the second, where “salvation” hardly appears (iii. 15), He is ordinarily “our Lord” (or God?) “and Saviour Jesus Christ” (i. [1,] 11; ii. 20; iii. 18), or “our Lord Jesus Christ” (i. 2 [“Jesus our Lord”], 8, 14, 16): but never simply “Christ,” “Jesus Christ,” or “Christ Jesus.” This, which has been also alleged as against the identity of writers, is, I submit, strikingly characteristic of the different realms of thought of the two Epistles. In the first, it is community of suffering and glorification with Him, which is to give encouragement: His lordly and glorious titles are dropped, and his office (“Christ”) or combined Person and office (“Jesus Christ,” or “Christ Jesus”) is ever brought forward. But in this second, where warning, and caution against rebellion are mainly in view, we are ever reminded of His lordship by “Lord,” and of what He did for us by "Saviour:" and without the former, or both titles, He never appears.

21. Another objection has been found in the apparent anxiety of the Writer to shew that he is the Apostle Peter, thereby betraying that he was not that Apostle. But here again, we may surely say just as fairly, that this is in manifest consistency with the character and design of the Epistle, which cautions against, and stigmatizes, false teachers. Thus we find St. Paul, in those Epistles where his object is the same, most strongly asserting his Apostleship, and his personal qualification as a teacher and ruler of the church. Were the Epistle genuine, this is just what we might expect.

22. The supposed objection, that in the reference to an apostolic command, ch. iii. 2, the Writer seems to sever himself from the Apostles, loses all weight by the reflection, that the words most naturally mean, as explained in the note on the passage, the Apostles who preached to you, much as in 1 Pet. i. 12: the Writer himself forming one only of that class, and thus preferring to specify it as a class<sup>9</sup>. Besides, I submit that such an objection is suicidal, when connected with that last mentioned. If the object of the (apocryphal) Writer was, elaborately to represent himself as St. Peter, how can the same view of the Epistle be consistent in finding in it a proof, by his own deliberate shewing, that he is not an Apostle? Forgers surely do not thus designedly overthrow their own fabrics.

23. The last objection which I shall notice is, the reference to St. Paul's Epistles, in ch. iii. 15, 16, as indicating a later date than is consistent with the genuineness of our Epistle. They are there evidently adduced as existing in some number: and as forming part of the recognized Scriptures. No doubt, these undeniable phenomena of our Epistle are worthy of serious consideration; and they present to us, I am free to confess, a difficulty almost insuperable, if the common traditions respecting the end of St. Peter's life are to be received as matters of fact. But we are not bound by those traditions, though inclined to retain them in deference to ancient testimonies: we are at all events free to assume as great a latitude in their dates as the phenomena of the sacred writings seem to require. All therefore that we can say of this reference to the writings of St. Paul, is that, believing on other grounds this Epistle to be written by St. Peter, this seems to require for it a later date than is consistent with the usually received traditions of his death, and that our reception of such traditions must be modified accordingly.

24. At the same time it must be borne in mind, that it is an entirely unwarranted assumption, to understand by "all Epistles" here, an entire collection of St. Paul's Epistles as we now have them, seeing that the words can only represent as many of them as the Writer had seen<sup>1</sup>; and that it is equally unjustifiable to gather from what follows, that the sacred canon of the New Test. was at that time settled. Those words cannot imply more, than that there were certain writings by Christian teachers, which were reckoned as on a level with the Old Test. Scriptures, and called by the same name (see note there). And that that was the case, even in the traditional lifetime of St. Peter, it would be surely unreasonable to deny.

25. The diversity of style in the two Epistles has been frequently alleged<sup>2</sup>. But on going through all that has been said, I own I cannot regard it, considerable as it undoubtedly is, as any more than can well be accounted for by the total diversity of subject and mood in the two Epistles, and by the interweaving into this second one of copious reminiscences from another Epistle. Some of the differences we have already spoken of, when treating of the titles and names of our Lord appearing in the two Epistles; and have found them amply accounted for by the above reasons. The same might be said of the terms used for the coming of our Lord,—“revelation” and “revealing” in the first Epistle, “presence,” “day of the Lord,” “day of judgment” in this<sup>3</sup>: the same again of the prevalence of “hope” in the former Epistle, and of “knowledge” in this. Some of the objections adduced on this head are without foundation in fact, e. g. that which Davidson admits, that whereas “in the first Epistle the Writer makes considerable use of the Old Test., incorporating its sentiments and diction into his own composition; in the second there is hardly a reference to the Jewish Scriptures.” What then are we to say of ch. i. 19—21; ii. 1, 5, 6, 7 f., 15 f., 22; iii. 2, 4, 5 f., 8, 13? May not it be said that although the second Epistle, from the nature of the case, does not require so many references to the new-begetting word, yet the mind of the Writer was equally full of its facts and sentiments?

26. Some of the points of resemblance between the two Epistles have been very fairly stated by Davidson and by Brückner: and the latter writer has corrected the over-statements of Dietlein. Of these coincidences, “virtue,” as applied to God, has been already noticed. Others are, "without blemish and without spot," 1 Pet. i. 19, compared with "without spot and blameless," 2 Pet. iii. 14; which is the more striking from its independence in the connexion, being used in an entirely different reference. The sound of these two words again occurs in the midst of the adaptation from St. Jude, ii. 13. Other similarities there are which cannot be represented to the English reader, but will be found in the corresponding part of the Prolegomena to my Greek Testament.

27. It may be allowed us to remark some notes of genuineness which are found in our Epistle, which, though at first sight of small import, and lying beneath the surface, yet possess considerable interest. In ch. i. 17, 18, we have a reference to the presence of the Writer at the transfiguration of our Lord. It is a remarkable coincidence, that close to that reference, and in the verses leading on to it, two words should occur, both of which are connected with the narrative of the Transfiguration in the Gospels. In ver. 13 we have "as long as I am in this tabernacle:" let us remember that it was Peter who at the Transfiguration said, "Let us make three tabernacles." In ver. 15, "after my departure (exodus)." At the Transfiguration Moses and Elias "spoke of His decease (exodus) which He should accomplish at Jerusalem."

28. We have also very noticeable coincidences of another kind. Compare, among them, the use of "godliness," ch. i. 3, 6, 7, with Acts iii. 12, where, in Peter's speech, it is only found, except in the Pastoral Epistles: "lawless deeds," ch. ii. 8, with "by lawless hands," Acts ii. 23: "godly," ch. ii. 9, with Acts x. 2, 7, an account doubtless derived from St. Peter, —the only places where the word occurs in the New Test.: "being punished," ibid., with Acts iv. 21, another Petrine account, and also the only places where the Greek word occurs: "the day of the Lord," ch. iii. 10, with the citation Acts ii. 20, where only it occurs, except 1 Thess. v. 21. Such things are not to be despised, in estimating the probability of our Epistle being a supposititious document.

29. Our general conclusion from all that has preceded must be in favour of the genuineness and canonicity of this second Epistle: acknowledging at the same time, that the subject is not without considerable difficulty. That difficulty however is lightened for us by observing that on the one hand, it is common to this Epistle with some others of those called Catholic, and several of the later writings of the New Testament: and on the other, that no difference can be imagined more markedly distinctive, than that which separates all these writings from even the earliest and best of the post-apostolic period. Our Epistle is one of those latter fruits of the great outpouring of the Spirit on the Apostles, which, not being entrusted to the custody of any one church or individual, required some considerable time to become generally known: which when known, were suspected, bearing as they necessarily did traces of their late origin, and notes of polemical argument:

but of which, as apostolic and inspired writings, there never was, when once they became known, any general doubt ; and which, as the sacred Canon became fixed, acquired, and have since maintained, their due and providential place among the books of the New Testament.

SECTION V.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.

1. These can only be set down conjecturally, in accordance with views and considerations previously advanced. Assuming the genuineness of the Epistle, St. Peter wrote it in his old age, when he was expecting his death<sup>4</sup>. This, agreeably to what was said on the first Epistle, would be somewhere about the year 68 A.D., and the place of writing would be Rome, or somewhere on the journey thither from the East.

2. But all this is far too uncertain, and too much beset with chronological difficulties, to be regarded as any thing more than a hypothetical corollary, contingent on our accepting the tradition of St. Peter's Roman martyrdom.

3. Several matters, which have formed the subject of sections in our other chapters, such as the character and style of the Epistle, have been already incidentally discussed.

CHAPTER XIX.

1 JOHN.

ITS AUTHORSHIP.

1. THE internal testimony furnished by this Epistle to its Author being the same with the Author of the fourth Gospel is, it may well be thought, incontrovertible. To maintain a diversity of Authorship would betray the very perverseness and exaggeration of that school of criticism which refuses to believe, be evidence never so strong.

<sup>4</sup> This inference is not made from the word "shortly," in ch. i. 14 (see note there), but from the general spirit of that passage.

2. It will be well however not to assume this identity, but to proceed in the same way as we have done with the other books of the New Testament, establishing the Authorship by external ecclesiastical testimony.

Polycarp, in his Epistle to the Philippians, writes : "For every one who confesses not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is antichrist." Seeing that this contains a plain allusion to 1 John iv. 3, and that Polycarp was the disciple of St. John, it has ever been regarded as an indirect testimony to the genuineness, and so to the Authorship of our Epistle.

3. It is said of Papias by Eusebius, "The same (Papias) uses testimonies from the former Epistle of John, and in like manner from that of Peter." And be it remembered that Irenæus says of Papias that he was "a hearer of John, and companion of Polycarp."

4. Irenæus frequently quotes this Epistle, as Eusebius asserts of him. In his work against heresies, after citing John xx. 31, with the words, "as John the disciple of the Lord confirms, saying," . . . he proceeds, "For which reason also in his Epistle he thus testified to us : 'Little children, it is the last time,' &c." (1 John ii. 18 ff.). Again, he says, "Whom both the Lord forewarned us to beware of, and His disciple John in the forementioned Epistle ordered us to shun, saying, 'Many seducers are gone out,' &c." (2 John 7, 8 : so that "in the fore-mentioned Epistle" seems to be a lapse of memory): "And again in his Epistle he says, 'Many false prophets are gone out,' &c." (1 John iv. 1—3).

And just after, he proceeds, "Wherefore again in his Epistle he says, 'Every one who believeth that Jesus is the Christ, hath been begotten of God,' &c." (1 John v. 1).

5. Clement of Alexandria repeatedly refers to our Epistle as written by St. John. In one place he says : "Moreover John, in his greater Epistle, seems to teach different degrees of sin, in these words : 'If any man see his brother sinning,' &c." (1 John v. 16).

In another he quotes 1 John i. 6 f. with "John says in his Epistle." And similarly in other places.

6. Tertullian says, "As John the Apostle, who says that antichrists had already gone forth into the world, spirits precursors of antichrist, denying that Christ has come in the flesh, and breaking up Jesus" (1 John iv. 1 ff.). "And again : 'That which we have seen,' says John, 'which we have heard,' &c." (1 John i. 1). And so in several other places : citing ch. ii. 22 ; iv. 2 ; v. 1 ; i. 7.

7. Cyprian writes : "John the Apostle also, mindful of the commandment, afterwards writes in his Epistle : 'In this we understand that we know Him, if we keep His commandments,' &c." (ch. ii. 3, 4). And he cites also ch. ii. 15—17 ; i. 8 ; ii. 6.

8. Muratori's fragment on the canon states, "Two Epistles of John are held to be in Catholic Scripture."

9. The Epistle is found in the Peshito, or ancient Syriac version, whose canon in the Catholic Epistles is so short.

10. Origen, beginning the sentence, "Why should I speak of John, who lay upon the breast of Jesus". . . , and proceeding as cited in the Introd. to the Apocalypse, § i. par. 12, says, "Moreover he has left an Epistle of very few lines: perhaps also a second and a third,—for all do not confess these to be genuine: but both are not a hundred lines in length." And he continually cites the Epistle as St. John's: e. g. "'Our God is a consuming fire:' but in John He is light; for 'God,' says he, 'is light, and darkness in Him is none.'"

11. Dionysius of Alexandria, the scholar of Origen, recognizes the genuineness of the Gospel and Epistle as being written by the Apostle John, by the very form of his argument against the genuineness of the Apocalypse. For (see his reasoning at length in the Introduction to the Revelation, § i. par. 48) he tries to prove that it was not written by St. John, on account of its diversity in language and style from the Gospel and Epistle: and distinctly cites the words of our Epistle as those of the Evangelist: "The Evangelist did not even prefix his name to the Catholic Epistle, but without waste of words began from the mystery itself of the divine manifestation: 'That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes.'"

12. Eusebius says, "of the writings of John, in addition to the Gospel, the former of the Epistles is confessed undoubtedly both by those now living, and by the ancients." And again, having enumerated the four Gospels and Acts and the Epistles of Paul, he says, "In order after which we must definitely place the current former Epistle of John."

13. After the time of Eusebius, general consent pronounced the same verdict. We may terminate the series of testimonies with that of Jerome, who in his catalogue of Ecclesiastical writers says of St. John, "He wrote also one Epistle, of which the opening is, 'That which was from the beginning, &c.,' which is received by all ecclesiastical and learned men."

14. The first remarkable contradiction to this combination of testimony is found in the writings of Cosmas Indicopleustes, in the sixth century. He ventures to assert, that none of the earlier Christian writers who have treated of the canon, makes any mention of the Catholic Epistles as canonical: "For most persons hold them not to be written by the Apostles, but by some other simpler men among the elders." He then proceeds in a somewhat confused way to state that Irenæus does mention

1 Peter and 1 John, as apostolic, “but others do not even acknowledge them as coming from Apostles, but from the elders: for a first, and second, and third of John have been written, making evident shew of being the work of one person.” But it is evident from the chain of testimonies given above, that Cosmas can have been but ill informed on the subject.

15. It is probable that the Alogi, mentioned by Epiphanius as rejecting the Gospel and Apocalypse, included the Epistles in this rejection. Still Epiphanius does not assert it; he only says, “Perhaps also the Epistles; for they agree in sense with the Gospel and the Apocalypse.” But their repudiation of the Epistle would be of no account.

16. Its rejection by Marcion is of equally little consequence. He excluded from the canon all the writings of St. John, as not suiting his views.

17. Lücke closes his review of ancient authorities, which I have followed and expanded, by saying, “Incontestably then our Epistle must be numbered among those canonical books which are most strongly upheld by ecclesiastical tradition.”

18. But the genuineness of the Epistle rests not, as already observed, on external testimony alone. It must remain an acknowledged fact, until either the Gospel is proved not to be St. John’s, or the similarity between the two is shewn to be only apparent. Lücke has well observed, that neither Gospel nor Epistle can be said to be an imitation: both are original, but both the product of the same mind: so that considered only in this point of view, we might well doubt which was written first.

19. However, its genuineness has been controverted in modern times. First we have a rash and characteristic saying of Jos. Scaliger’s: “The three Epistles of John are not by John the Apostle.” The first who deliberately and on assigned grounds took the same side, was S. Gottlieb Lange: who, strange to say, receiving the Gospel and the Apocalypse, yet rejected the Epistle.

20. His argument, as reported by Lücke, is as follows: The entire failure in the Epistle of any individual, personal, and local notices, betrays an author unacquainted with the personal circumstances of the Apostle, and those of the churches where he taught. The close correspondence of the Epistle with the Gospel in thought and expression begets a suspicion that some careful imitator of John wrote the Epistle. Lastly, the Epistle, as compared with the Gospel, shews such evident signs of enfeeblement of spirit by old age, that if it is to be ascribed to John, it must have been written at the extreme end of his life, after the destruction of Jerusalem; whereas, from no allusion being made to that event even in such a passage as ch. ii. 18, the Epistle makes a shew of having been written before it. The only solution in Lange's estimation is that some imitator wrote it, as St. John's, it may be a century after his time.

21. To this Lücke replies that Lange is in fourfold error. For 1, it is not true that the Epistle contains no individual and personal notices. These it is true are rather hinted at and implied than brought to the surface : a characteristic, not only of a catholic epistle as distinguished from one locally addressed, but also of the style of St. John as distinguished from that of St. Paul. As to the fact, the Writer designates himself by implication as an apostle, and seems to allude to his Gospel in ch. i. 1—4 : in ch. ii. 1, 18, he implies an intimate relation between himself and his readers : in ch. ii. 12—14, he distinguishes his readers according to their ages : in ch. ii. 18, 19, iv. 1—3, the false teachers are pointed at in a way which shews that both Writer and readers knew more about them : and the warning, ch. v. 21, has a local character, and reminds the readers of something well known to them.

22. Secondly, it is entirely denied, as above remarked, that there is the slightest trace of slavish imitation. The Epistle is in no respect the work of an imitator of the Gospel. Such a person would have elaborated every point of similarity, and omitted no notice of the personal and local circumstances of the Apostle : would have probably misunderstood and exaggerated St. John's peculiarities of style and thought. All such attempts to put off one man's writing for that of another carry in them the elements of failure as against a searching criticism. But how different is all we find in this Epistle. By how wide a gap is it separated from the writings of Ignatius, Clement, Barnabas, Polycarp. Apparently close as it is upon them in point of time, what a totally different spirit breathes in it. This Epistle written after them, written among them, would be indeed the rarest of exceptional cases—an unimaginable anachronism, a veritable "hysteron proteron."

23. Thirdly : it is certainly the strangest criticism, to speak of the weakness of old age in the Epistle. If this could be identified as really being so, it would be the strongest proof of authenticity. For it is altogether inconceivable, that an imitator could have had the power or the purpose to write as John might have written in his old age. But where are the traces of this second childishness ? We are told, in the repetitions, in the want of order, in the uniformity. Certainly there is an appearance of tautology in the style : more perhaps than in the Gospel. Erasmus, in the dedication of his paraphrase of St. John's Gospel, characterizes the style of the Gospel as a "kind of speech so interwoven as it were with points of connexion mutually cohering, consisting sometimes of contraries, sometimes of things like, sometimes of the same things again repeated,—that each member of the argument so enters and takes it up as that the end of a former part is also the beginning of that which follows." The same style prevails in the Epistle. It is not however an infirmity of age, but a peculiarity, which might belong to extreme youth just as well.

24. The greater amount of repetition in the Epistle arises from its being more hortatory and tender in character. And it may also be attributed to its more Hebraistic form, in which it differs from the Grecian and dialectic style of St. Paul: abounding in parallels and apparent arguings in a circle. The epistolary form would account for the want of strict arrangement in order, which would hardly be observed by the youngest any more than by the oldest writer.

25. And the appearance of uniformity, partly accounted for by the oneness of subject and simplicity of spirit, is often produced by want of deep enough penetration of the sense to discover the real differences in passages which seem to express the same. Besides, even granting these marks of old age, what argument would they furnish against the genuineness? St. John was quite old enough at and after the siege of Jerusalem for such to have shewn themselves: so that this objection must be dealt with on other grounds, and does not affect our present question.

26. Fourthly, it is quite a mistake to suppose that if the Epistle was written after the destruction of Jerusalem, that event must necessarily have been intimated in ch. ii. 18. It cannot be proved, nor does it seem likely from the notices of the coming of the Lord in the Gospel, that St. John connected the "last hour" with the destruction of Jerusalem. It does not seem likely that, writing to Christians of Asia Minor, who probably from the first had a wider view of our Lord's prophecy of the end, he should have felt bound to make a corrective allusion to the event, even supposing he himself had once identified it with the time of the end. They would not require to be told, why the universal triumph of Christianity had not followed it, seeing they probably never expected it to do so.

27. So that Lange's objections, which I have reported freely from Lücke, as being highly illustrative of the character of the Epistle, certainly do not succeed in impugning the verdict of antiquity, or the evidence furnished by the Epistle itself.

28. The objections brought by Bretschneider, formed on the doctrine of the logos (Word), and the antidocetic tendency manifest both in the Epistle and the Gospel, and betraying both as works of the second century, have also been shewn by Lücke to be untenable. The doctrine of the Word, though formally enounced by St. John only, is in fact that of St. Paul in Col. i. 15 ff., and that of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews i. 1 ff., and was unquestionably prepared for Christian use long before, in the Alexandrine Jewish theology. And though Docetism itself may have been the growth of the second century, yet the germs of it, which are opposed in this Epistle, were apparent long before. A groundless assumption of Bretschneider is, that seeing the three Epistles are by the same hand, and the writer of the second and third, where there was no ground for concealing himself, calls himself "the elder" ("presbyter"),—the first Epistle, where, wishing to be taken for the Apostle, he does not name himself, is also by John the Presbyter. The answer to which is, that we can by no means consent to the assumption that the so-called Presbyter John was the author of the second and third Epistles : see the Introduction to 2 and 3 John, § i. 2, 12 ff.

29. The objections brought against our Epistle by the modern Tübingen school are dealt with at considerable length by Düsterdieck. It is not my purpose to enter on them here. For mere English readers, it would require an introduction far longer than that which Düsterdieck has devoted to it, at all to enable them to appreciate the nature of those objections and the postulates from which they spring. And when I inform such English readers that the first of those postulates is the denial of a personal God, they will probably not feel that they have lost much by not having the refutation of the objections laid before them. Should any regret it, they may find some of them briefly noticed in Dr. Davidson's Introduction, vol. iii. pp. 454 ff. : and they will there see how feeble and futile they are.

30. Whether then we approach the question of the authorship of this Epistle (and its consequent canonicity) from the side of external testimony, or of internal evidence, we are alike convinced that its claim to have been written by the Evangelist St. John, and to its place in the canon of Scripture, is fully substantiated.

SECTION II.

FOR WHAT READERS IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. This question, in the case of our Epistle, might be very easily and briefly dealt with, were it not for one apparent mistake, which complicates it.

In Augustine we read, "Agreeable to this opinion is also that which is said by John in the Epistle to the Parthians;" and then follows 1 John iii. 2. This appears to be the only place in Augustine's writings where he thus characterizes it. The inscription "To the Parthians" has found its way into some of the Benedictine editions in the title of the Tractates on the Epistle : but it seems not to have been originally there. It has been repeated by some of the Latin fathers.

2. Some, but very few writers, have assumed as a fact that the Epistle was really written to the Parthians. Paulus and Baur made use of the assumption to impugn the apostolicity of the Epistle. Grotius, who was followed by Hammond, and partially by Michaelis and Baumgarten-Crusius, gives a curious reason, in connexion with this idea, for the omission of all address and personal notices: "The Epistle was anciently called that to the Parthians, i. e. those Jews professing Christianity who lived under the rule not of the Romans, but of the Parthians in the parts beyond the Euphrates, where there was a great multitude of Jews, as at Nearda, Nisibis, and other places. And I imagine this to be the reason why this Epistle contains neither the name and title of an Apostle in its opening, nor salutations after the apostolic manner at its close, because the Epistle was to be sent by Ephesian merchants into lands hostile to the Romans, and it might have been very damaging to the Christians if this epistolary commerce, though innocent, had been detected." This is absurd enough, especially as the Epistle is evidently not addressed to Jews at all as such, but mainly to Gentile readers: see below, par. 5. And ecclesiastical tradition knows of no mission of St. John to the Parthians, St. Thomas being supposed to have carried the Gospel to them.

3. This being so, it would appear, as hinted before, that the supposed address "to the Parthians" rests upon some mistake. But if so, on what mistake? A conjecture is quoted from Serrarius that in the original text of Augustine it stood "to the Patmians." Other conjectures are enumerated in my Greek Test., among which the most probable is that the Greek word "parthenos," a virgin, either as a title of those addressed, or a name of the Apostle himself, has somehow produced the mistake.

4. At all events we may fairly assume, that the Epistle was not written to the Parthians. Nor is there more probability in the notion of Benson that it was addressed to the Jewish Christians in Judæa and Galilee, who had seen the Lord in the flesh: nor in that of Lightfoot, who sends it to the church at Corinth, supposing the Gaius to whom the third Epistle is addressed, identical with him of Acts xix. 29 and 1 Cor. i. 14, and the fact alluded to in 3 John 9 to refer to this first Epistle.

5. Setting aside these, and falling back on the general opinion, we believe the Epistle to have been written not to any one church, but to a cycle of churches, mainly consisting of Gentile converts. This last seems shewn by the warning of ch. v. 21, combined with the circumstance that so little reference is made to Old Test. sayings or history.

6. It evidently also appears, that the Apostle is the spiritual teacher of those to whom he is writing. He knows their circumstances and various advances in the faith: the whole tone is that of their father in the faith. Such a relation, following as we surely must the traces furnished by ancient tradition, can only be found in the case of St. John, by believing the readers to have been members of the churches at and round Ephesus, where he lived and taught.

7. The character of the Epistle is too general to admit a comparison between it and the Ephesian Epistle in the Apocalypse, which some have endeavoured to institute. Our Epistle contains absolutely no materials on which such a comparison can proceed.

SECTION III.

ITS RELATION TO THE GOSPEL OF ST. JOHN.

1. As introductory to this enquiry, it will be well to give an account of opinions respecting the epistolary form of this canonical book.

2. This was always taken for granted, seeing that definite readers and their circumstances are continually present, and that the first and second persons plural are constantly used<sup>5</sup>,—until Michaelis<sup>6</sup> maintained that it is rather a treatise, or a book, than a letter; and only so far a letter, as any treatise may be addressed to certain readers, e.g. the Acts to Theophilus. Accordingly, he holds this to be a second part of the Gospel.

3. As Lücke remarks, it is of great importance whether we consider the writing as an Epistle or not. Our decision on this point affects both our estimate of it, and our exposition. Surely, however, the question is not difficult to decide. We may fairly reply to the hypothesis which supposes the Epistle to be a second part of the Gospel, that the Gospel is complete in itself and requires no such supplement; see John xx. 30, 31, where the practical object also of the Gospel is too plainly asserted, for us to suppose this to be its practical sequel.

4. To view it again as a preface and introduction to the Gospel, as Hug, seems not to be borne out by the spirit of either writing. The Gospel requires no such introduction: the Epistle furnishes none such. They do not in a word stand in any external relation to one another, such as is imagined by every one of these hypotheses.

5. Hug fancied he found a trace of the Epistle having once been appended to the Gospel, in the Latin version attached to Beza's great MS. now at Cambridge. There, on the back of the leaf on which the Acts of the Apostles begin, the copyist has written the last column of 3 John, with this subscription: "Here end the three Epistles of

John: here beginneth the Acts of the Apostles." But first, this proves too much, seeing that all three Epistles of St. John are included, and surely Hug does not suppose the second and third Epistles to have been also sequels to the Gospel: and secondly, this very circumstance, the inclusion of all three Epistles, shews the reason of the arrangement, viz., to place together the writings of the same Apostle.

6. The writing then is to be regarded as an Epistle, as it usually has been: and no closer external relation to the Gospel must be sought for.

But, this being premised, a very interesting question follows. The two writings are internally related, in a remarkable manner. Do the phenomena of this relation point out the Gospel, or the Epistle, as having been first written?

7. And to this question there can I think be but one answer. The Epistle again and again assumes, on the part of its readers, an acquaintance with the facts of the Gospel narrative. Lücke well remarks, that "as a rule, the shorter, more concentrated expression of one and the same writer, especially when ideas peculiar to him are concerned, is the later, while the more explicit one, which first unfolds and puts in shape the idea, is the earlier one." And he finds examples of this in the abbreviated formulæ of ch. i. 1, 2, as compared with John i. 1 ff.; iv. 2, compared with John i. 14.

8. Other considerations connected with this part of our subject will be found treated in the next section.

SECTION IV.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.

1. On both of these, opinions have been much divided: no sure indications being furnished by the Epistle itself. If however we have been right in assigning to it a date subsequent to that of the Gospel, we shall bring that date, by what has been said in the Introduction to Vol. I. ch. v. § iv. (where fifteen years, A.D. 70—85, are shewn to have marked the probable limits of the time of the writing of the Gospel), within a time not earlier than perhaps about the middle of the eighth decade of the first century: and extending as late as the traditional age of the Apostle himself.

2. Some have imagined that the Epistle betrays marks of the extreme old age of the writer. But such inferences are very fallacious. Certainly the repeated use of "little children," more frequently than any other term of endearing address, seems to point to an aged writer: but even this is insecure.

2. Again it has been fancied that the words, "it is the last time," ch. ii. 18, furnish a note of time; and must be understood of the approaching destruction of Jerusalem. But as Lücke replies, this expression is used simply in reference to the appearance of antichristian teachers, and the apprehension thence arising that the coming of the Lord was at hand. So that we have no more right to infer a note of time from it, than from similar expressions in St. Paul, e. g. 1 Tim. iv. 1; 2 Tim. iii. 1.

4. As to the place of writing, we are just as much in uncertainty. The Gospel (Vol. I. Introd. ch. v. § iv.) is said by Irenæus to have been written at Ephesus. And ancient tradition, if at least represented by the subscriptions to the Epistle, seems to have placed the writing of the Epistle there also. Further, it is impossible to say.

SECTION V.

CONTENTS. AND ARRANGEMENT.

1. This Epistle, from its aphoristic and apparently tautological character, is exceedingly difficult to arrange as a continuous contextual whole. Some indeed from this have been induced to believe that there is no such contextual connexion in the Epistle. So Calvin, Episcopus, and others. And this seems, up to the beginning of the last century, to have been the prevailing view. About that time, Sebastian Schmid, in his commentary on the Epistle, maintained, but only tentatively and timidly, that there is a logical and contextual arrangement. The same side was taken up with more decision by Oporinus of Göttingen.

2. But the principal advocate of this view in the last century was Bengel. In his note on the famous passage, ch. v. 7, he gives his contextual system of the Epistle<sup>7</sup>. This arrangement is made in the interest of the disputed verse, and tends to give it an important place in the context of the Epistle. It is moreover highly artificial, and the Trinitarian character, which is made to predominate in it, is certainly far from the obvious key to the real arrangement, as given us by the Epistle itself.

3. Nearer to our own time, differing arrangements of the Epistle have been proposed, by Lücke, De Wette, and Düsterdieck. I shall take these three in order.

4. Lücke holds the proper theme of the Epistle, the object, ground, and binding together of all its doctrinal and practical sayings, to be this proposition: "As the ground and root of all Christian fellowship is, the fellowship which each individual has with the Father and the Son in faith and in love, so this latter necessarily unfolds and exhibits itself in that former, viz. in the fellowship with the brethren." Having laid this down, he divides the Epistle into many sections, all unfolding in various ways this central truth. Thus, e. g., ch. i. 5—ii. 2, speaks of fellowship with God through Jesus Christ. God is light: fellowship with Him is walking in light: all pretence to it without such walking, is falsehood. And striving after such purity is the condition under which only Christian fellowship subsists, and under which the blood of Christ cleanses from sin. For even the Christian state is a striving, and not free from sin, but proceeding ever in more detection and confession of it: which leads not to a compromise with sin, but to its entire annihilation.

5. This may serve for a specimen of Lücke's setting forth of the connexion of the Epistle: in which, as Düsterdieck observes, he does not attempt to grasp the master thoughts which account for the development, but merely follows it step by step. For this, however, Lücke does not deserve the blame which Düsterdieck imputes to him. His is obviously the right way to proceed, though it may not have been carried far enough in his hands: far better than the à priori assumption of a Trinitarian arrangement by Bengel. He has well given the sequence of thought, as it stands: but he has not accounted for it. The complete statement of the disposition of the matter of the Epistle must tell us not only how the train of thought proceeds, but why it thus proceeds.

6. A nearer approximation to this has been made by De Wette. His plan may be thus described. The great design of the Epistle is to confirm the readers in the Christian life as consisting in purity (love) and faith, and to this end to waken and sharpen the moral conscience by reminding them of the great moral axioms of the Gospel, by reminding them also of the inseparableness of morality and faith, to keep them from the influence of those false teachers who denied the reality of the manifestation of Jesus Christ in the flesh, and to convince them of the reality of that manifestation. The Epistle he arranges under 1. An introduction, ch. i. 1—4: 2. Three exhortations; a) i. 5—ii. 28, begins with reminding them of the nature of Christian fellowship, as consisting in walking in light, in purity from sin and keeping of God's commandments (i. 5—ii. 11): then proceeds by an earnest address to the readers (ii. 12—14), a warning against the love of the world (ii. 15—17), against false teachers, and an exhortation to keep fast hold of Christ (ii. 18—27), and concludes with a promise of confidence in the day of judgment.

b) He again reminds them of the fundamental moral axioms of the Gospel. The state of a child of God rests on the conditions of righteousness and purity from sin: he who commits sin belongs to the devil.

Especially is the distinction made between those who belong to God and those who belong to the devil, by Love and Hate: and therefore must we ever love in deed and in truth (ii. 29—iii. 18). The Apostle adds a promise of confidence towards God and answer to prayer, and exhorts them to add to love, faith in the Son of God (iii. 19—24): which leads him to a second express warning against the false teachers (iv. 1—6).

c) In this third Exhortation, the Apostle sets out with the simple principle of Love, which, constituting the essence of God Himself, and being revealed in the mission of Christ, is the condition of all adoption into God's family and all confidence towards God (iv. 7—21). But a co-ordinate condition is faith in the Son of God, as including in itself Love, and the keeping of God's commandments, and the strength requisite thereto. And the voucher for this faith is found in the historical facts and testimonies of baptism, of the death of Christ, and of the Holy Spirit, and in eternal life which He gives (v. 1—13). At the conclusion of the exhortation, we have the repeated promise of confidence towards God and the hearing of prayer, in this case intercessory prayer for a sinning brother, yet with a limitation, and a reminding that strictly speaking, Christians may not sin: ending with a warning against idolatry (v. 14—21).

7. To this division Düsterdieck objects, that the terms exhortation, reminding, &c., are of too superficial a kind to suffice for designating the various portions of the Epistle, and that De Wette is in error in supposing a new train of thought to be begun in ch. iv. 7—21: rather does the leading axiom of ch. ii. 29 proceed through that portion, and in fact even further than that.

8. His own division, which has been in the main followed in my Commentary, is as follows. Regarding, as the others, ch. i. 1—4 as the Introduction, in which the writer lays down the great object of apostolic preaching, asserts of himself full apostolicity, and announces the purpose of his writing,—he makes two great divisions of the Epistle: the first, i. 5—ii. 28, the second, ii. 29—v. 5: on which follows the conclusion, v. 6—21.

9. Each of these great divisions is ruled and pervaded by one master thought, announced clearly in its outset; which we may call its theme. These themes are impressed on the readers both by positive and negative unfolding, and by polemical defence against erroneous teachers: and, this being done, each principal portion is concluded with a corresponding promise. And both principal portions tend throughout to throw light on the great subject of the whole, viz. FELLOWSHIP WITH GOD THE FATHER AND THE LORD JESUS CHRIST.

10. The theme of the first portion is given ch. i. 5, "God is Light, and in Him is no darkness." Consequently, fellowship with Him, on which depends our joy in Christ (i. 3, 4), belongs only to him who walks in light (i. 6). To walk thus in light as God is light (i. 6 ff., ii. 8 ff.), and to flee from darkness, in which there can be no fellowship with God (ii. 11 ff.), forms the first subject of the Apostle's Exhortation. To this end, after shewing the relation which this proposition, "God is light," has to us in regard of our fellowship with God and with one another through Jesus Christ (i. 6, 7), he unfolds first positively (i. 8—ii. 11) wherein our walking in light consists: viz. in free recognition and humble confession of our own sinfulness: the knowledge and confession of our own darkness being in fact the first breaking in on us of the light, in which we must walk: viz. fellowship with God through Christ, whose blood is to cleanse us from all our sin.

11. This our walking in light, whose first steps are the recognition, confession, and cleansing of sin, further consists in keeping the commandments of God, which are all summed up in one great commandment of Love (ii. 3—11). Hence only we know that we know God (ii. 3), that we love Him (ii. 5), that we are and abide in Him (ii. 6), in a word that we have fellowship with Him (cf. i. 3, 5 ff.), when we keep His commandments, when we walk (ii. 6, cf. i. 6) as "He," i. e. Christ, walked.

12. This summing up of all God's commands in love by the example of Christ as perfect love (John xiii. 34) brings in the negative side of the illustration of the proposition "God is light." Hate is darkness: is separation from God: is fellowship with the world. So begins then a polemical designation of and warning against the love of and fellowship with the world (ii. 15—17), and against those false teachers (ii. 18—26), who would bring them into this condition: and an exhortation to abide in Christ (ii. 24—28). All this is grounded on the present state and progress of the various classes among them in fellowship with God in Christ (ii. 12—14, 27). See each of these subdivisions more fully specified in the Commentary.

13. The second great portion of the Epistle (ii. 29—v. 5) opens, as the other, with the announcement of its theme: "God is righteous" (ii. 29), and "he who doeth righteousness, is born of Him." And as before, "God is Light" made the condition of fellowship with God to be, walking in light as "He" walked in light, so now, "God is righteous" makes the condition of "sonship" on our part to be that we be righteous, as "He," Christ, was holy. And as before also, so now: it must be shewn wherein this righteousness of God's children consists, in contrast to the righteousness of the children of the world and of the devil. And so we have in this second part also a twofold exhortation, a positive and a negative: the middle point of which is the fundamental axiom "God is righteous, and therefore we His children must be righteous:" and thus it also serves the purpose of the Epistle announced in

i. 3 f. to confirm the readers in fellowship with the Father and the Son, and so to complete their joy: for this fellowship is the state of God's children.

14. This, however, as on the one side it brings in all blessed hope and our glorious inheritance (iii. 2, 3), so on the other it induces the moral necessity of that righteousness on which our fellowship with the Father and the Son, our abiding in Him, rests, grounded on His Love (iii. 8, 9, 10 ff.: iv. 7 ff. &c.). Both sides of the birth from God, that which looks forward and that which looks backward, are treated together by the Apostle. Because we are born of God, not of the world, because we are God's children, not the devil's (because we know Him,—because we are of the truth,—because His Spirit is in us,—which are merely parallel enunciations of the same moral fact), therefore we sin not, therefore we practise righteousness, as God our Father is just and holy: and thus sanctifying ourselves, thus doing righteousness, thus abiding in Him and in His love, as His children, even thus we may comfort ourselves in the blessed hope of God's children to which we are called, even thus we overcome the world.

15. It will be well to examine more in detail the order in which the exhortation proceeds in this second portion of the Epistle.

16. First, after the enunciation of the theme in ii. 29, the Apostle takes up the forward side of the state of God's children, that hope which is full of promise (iii. 1, 2); then proceeds to the condition of this hope, purifying ourselves even as "He" is pure (iii. 3). This purifying consists in fleeing from sin, which is against God's command (iii. 4), and presupposes abiding in Him who has taken away our sins (iii. 5, 6): the Apostle thus grounding sanctification in its condition, justification.

17. Having laid down (iii. 7) the positive axiom, "He that doeth righteousness is righteous even as 'He' is righteous," he turns to the other and negative side (iii. 8 ff.), contrasting the children of God and the children of the devil. And this leads us to an explanation how the abiding in the love of God necessarily puts itself forth in the love of the brethren (iii. 11—18). Hate is the sure sign of not being from God (iii. 10): love to the brethren a token of being from Him (iii. 18, 19), and being of the truth (ib.): and is a ground of confidence towards God (iii. 20, 21), and of the certainty of an answer to our prayers (iii. 22).

18. This confidence towards Him is summed up in one central and decisive pledge—the Spirit which He has given us (iii. 24): and thus the Apostle is led on to warn us against false spirits which are not of God (iv. 1 ff.), and to give us a certain test whereby we may know the true from the false. He sets the two in direct opposition (iv. 1—6), and designates the false spirit as that of antichrist: making its main characteristic the denial of Christ having come in the flesh. This he concludes with a formula parallel to that in the first part, iii. 10 : "Hereby know we the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error."

19. After this (iv. 7 ff.) follows a fuller positive description of that which is born of God. Its very essence is love: for God is Love: Love to God grounded on His previous love to us (iv. 7—21) in sending His Son: love to one another, resting on the same motive, and moreover (v. 1—5) because our brethren, like ourselves, are born of Him. And seeing that our love to God and to one another is grounded on God having given us His Son, we come to this, that faith in the Son of God is the deepest ground and spring of our love in both its aspects: and is the true test of being born of God as distinguished from being of the world (iv. 1—6), the true condition of life (iv. 9: cf. v. 13, i. 3, 4), of blessed confidence (iv. 14 ff.), of victory over the world (iv. 4, v. 4 f.). And thus the Apostle's exhortation converges gradually to the one point against which the lie of antichrist is directed, viz. true faith in the Lord Jesus Christ manifested in the flesh (v. 5). On this faith rests the righteousness of those who are born of God, as on the other hand the antichristian character of the children of the world consists in the denial of Christ having come in the flesh. For this faith works by righteousness and sanctification, as God the Father, and as the Lord Jesus Christ, is righteous and holy: seeing that we, who are born of and abide in the love with which God in Christ hath first loved us, keep His commandments, viz. to practise love towards God and towards the brethren.

20. So that we see on the one side the simple parallelism of both parts, suggested by the nature of the subject: and on the other, how both parts serve the general purpose of the whole work. The righteousness of those that are born of God, who is righteous, is simply the walking in light as God is light: the keeping God's commandments which all converge into one, the commandment of love. And this love has its ground and its source in a right faith in the Son of God manifested in the flesh. On our fellowship therefore with this our Lord, depends our fellowship with the Father and with one another (i. 3, 7, ii. 23, iii. 23, iv. 7 ff.), and consequently our joy (i. 4), our confidence (ii. 28), our hope (iii. 3), our life (iii. 15, v. 13: cf. i. 2), our victory over the world (ii. 15 ff., iii. 7 ff., v. 5).

21. The CONCLUSION of the Epistle begins with v. 6. It is in two portions, v. 6—12 and v. 13—21. Both of these serve to bring the subject of the whole to its full completion, and, so to speak, to set it at rest. "Jesus is the Son of God." This is the sum and substance of the apostolic testimony and exhortation. In the opening of the Epistle it was rested on the testimony of eye and ear witnesses: now, it is rested on witness no less secure, viz. on the religious life and experience of the readers themselves. Between these two testimonies comes in the Epistle itself with all its teaching, exhortation, and warning. This last testimony that Jesus is the Son of God is threefold: the water of baptism, the blood of reconciliation, the Spirit of sanctification (v. 6—8). These, in threefold unity, form God's own witness for His Son (v. 9). Only in faith on the Son of God (v. 10) do we receive and possess this witness of God, the true substance of which is eternal life, bestowed on us in Christ through water, blood, and the Spirit. So that he that hath the Son hath life.

22. And thus we have reached the true goal of all the Apostle's exhortation: the words, "these things have I written" (v. 13), answering to the "these things write we" of i. 4. And it is this—that our fellowship with the Father, and with one another, rests on our fellowship with the Lord Jesus Christ the Son of God; on which also depends our confidence, our hope, our joy, seeing that we have eternal life in faith in the Son of God. As in ch. iii. 22, so here again he illustrates this confidence by its exercise with regard to the answer of our prayers. And of this he takes occasion to adduce one particular example, viz. intercession for a sinning brother; and to place it in its true moral light, viz., as then availing when the sin in question has not excluded him totally from the family of life and from holy fellowship with God. Then follow a few solemn sentences, gathering up the whole instruction of the Epistle: the living contrast between the sinner and the child of God: between the family of God and the world: the consciousness on the part of God's children of their standing and dignity in Christ, the true God and life eternal. And he ends by summing up in one word all his warnings against falsehood in doctrine and practice, "Little children, keep yourselves from idols."

23. Such is a free rendering of the account given by Düsterdieck of his division of the Epistle: which, for the reason stated above, I have inserted here almost at length. The points wherein I have differed from it will be easily recognized in the Commentary.

24. It has this decided advantage over the others, that it not only arranges, but accounts for the arrangement given: and without any straining of the material of the Epistle to suit a preconceived view, brings to light its inner structure and parallelisms in a way which leaves on the mind a view of it as an intelligently constructed and interdependent whole.

SECTION VI.

LANGUAGE AND STYLE.

1. The questions of language and style, which in other sections of the Introduction have required independent treatment, have in this case been already discussed by implication under other heads. Still it will be well to devote a few paragraphs to the separate consideration of these.

2. The style of the Epistle has been often truly described as aphoristic and repetitive. And in this is shewn the characteristic peculiarity of St. John's mode of thought. The connexion of sentence with sentence is slightly, if at all, pointed out. It depends, so to speak, on roots struck in at the bottom of the stream, hidden from the casual observer, to whom the aphorisms appear unconnected, and idly floating on the surface. Lücke well describes this style as indicating a contemplative spirit, which is ever given to pass from the particular to the general, from differences to the unity which underlies them, from the outer to the inner side of Christian life. Thus the Writer is ever working upon certain fundamental themes and axioms, to which he willingly returns again and again, sometimes unfolding and applying them, sometimes repeating and concentrating them; so that we have side by side the simplest and clearest, and the most condensed and difficult sayings: the reader who seeks merely for edification is attracted by the one, and the "scribe learned in the Scriptures" is satisfied, and his understanding surpassed and deepened by the other.

3. The logical connexion is not as in the Epistles of St. Paul, indicated by the whole superficial aspect of the writing, nor does it bear onward the thoughts till the conclusion is reached. The logic of St. John moves, as Düsterdieck has expressed it, rather in circles than straight onward. The same thought is repeated as seen from different sides: is transformed into cognate thoughts, and thus put into new lights, is unfolded into assertion and negation, and the negation again closed up by the repeated assertion (ch. i. 6 f., 8 f., ii. 9 f., &c.). Thus there arise numerous smaller groups of ideas, all, so to speak, revolving round some central point, all regarding some principal theme; all serving it, and circumscribed by the same bounding line. Thus the Writer is ever close to his main subject, and is able to be ever reiterating it without any unnatural forcing of his context: the train of thought is ever reverting back to its central point.

4. Now if we regard the actual process of the Epistle with reference to these characteristics, we find that there is one great main idea or theme, which binds together the whole and gives character to its contents and aim; viz. that fellowship with God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ, in which our joy is complete; in other words, that right faith in the Son of God manifest in the flesh, in which we overcome the world, in which we have confidence in God, and eternal life.

5. This idea, which pervades the whole Epistle, is set forth in two great circles of thought, which have been already described as the two portions of the Epistle. These two, both revolving round the one great theme, are also, in their inner construction, closely related to each other. God is light:—then our fellowship with Him depends on our walking in the light: God is righteous:—then we are only manifested as children of God, abiding in His love and in Himself, if we do righteousness. But for both—our walking in light, and our doing righteousness, there is one common term,—Love: even as God is Love, as Christ walked in Love, out of Love became manifest in the flesh, out of Love gave Himself for us. On the other side,—as the darkness of the world, which can have no fellowship with God, who is Light, denies the Son of God and repudiates Love,—so the unrighteousness of the children of the world manifests itself in that hatred which slays brethren, because love to brethren cannot be where the love of God in Christ is unknown and eternal Life untasted.

6. Such a style and character of the Epistle, not bound by strict dialectic rules, not hurrying onward to a logical conclusion, but loving to tarry, and to repeat, and to limit itself in smaller circles of thought, shews us the simple heart of a child, or rather the deep spirit of a man who, in the richest significance of the expression, has entered the kingdom of heaven as a little child, and, being blessed in it himself, yearns to introduce his brethren further and further into it, that they may rejoice with him. In his Epistle Christian truth, which is not dialectic only, but essentially moral and living, is made to live and move and feel and act. When he speaks of knowledge and faith, it is of a moral existence and possession: it is of love, peace, joy, confidence, eternal life. Fellowship with God and Christ, and fellowship of Christians with one another in faith and love, each of these is personal, real; so to speak, incarnate and embodied.

7. And this is the reason why our Epistle appears on the one hand easily intelligible to the simplest reader, if only his heart has any experience of the truth of Christ's salvation,—and on the other hand unfathomable even to the deepest Christian thinker: but at the same time equally precious and edifying to both classes of readers. It is the most notable example of the foolishness of God putting to shame all the wisdom of the world.

8. But as the matter of our Epistle is rich and sublime, so is it fitted, by its mildness, and consolatory character, to attract our hearts. Such is the power of that holy love, so humble and so gentle, which John had learned from Him in whom the Father's love was manifested. He addresses all his readers, young and old, as his little children: he calls them to him, and with him to the Lord: he exhorts them ever as his brothers, as his beloved, to that love which is from God. The Epistle itself is in fact nothing else than an act of this holy love. Hence the loving, attracting tone of the language; hence the friendly character and winning sound of the whole. For the Love which wrote the Epistle is but the echo, out of the heart of a man, and that man an Apostle, of that Love of God which is manifested to us in Christ, that it may lead us to the everlasting Fount of Love, of joy and of life.

9. I may conclude this description, so admirably worked out by Düsterdieck, with the very beautiful words of Ewald, which he also cites: speaking of the "unruffled and heavenly repose" which is the spirit of the Epistle, he says, "It appears to be the tone, not so much of a father talking with his beloved children, as of a glorified saint, speaking to mankind from a higher world. Never in any writing has the doctrine of heavenly Love, of a love working in stillness, a love ever unwearied, never exhausted, so thoroughly proved and approved itself, as in this Epistle."

SECTION VII.

OCCASION AND OBJECT.

1. The Apostle himself has given us an account of the object of his Epistle: "These things write we, that our joy may be full," ch. i. 4: and again at the close, v. 13: "These things have I written unto you, that ye may know that ye have eternal life, even to you that believe on the name of the Son of God." In almost the same words does he sum up the main purpose of his Gospel, John xx. 31. He assumes readers who believe on the Son of God: he writes to them to certify them of the truth and reality of the things in which they believe, and to advance them in the carrying out of their practical consequences, in order that they may gain from them confidence, peace, joy, life eternal.

2. This, and no polemical aim, is to be assigned as the main object of the Epistle. As subservient to this main object, comes in the warning against those persons who, by denying that Jesus Christ was come in the flesh, imperilled all these blessed consequences, by seducing men from the faith on which they rested.

3. The fact of these false teachers having come forward in the church was most probably the occasion which suggested the writing of the Epistle. Such seems to be the reference, hinted at in the background by the repeated "because" in ch. ii. 12—14. The previous instruction, settlement, and achievements in the faith of the various classes of his readers, furnished him with a reason for writing to each of them:

it being understood, that some circumstances had arisen, which made such writing desirable. And what those circumstances were, is not obscurely pointed at in the verses following, ii. 18—25: compare especially ver. 21.

CHAPTER XX.

2 & 3 JOHN.

AUTHORSHIP.

1. THE question of the authorship of both Epistles is one which will require some discussion. On one point however there never has been the slightest doubt: viz., that both were written by one and the same person. They are, as it has been said, like twin sisters: their style and spirit is the same: their conclusions agree almost word for word. I shall therefore treat of them together in all matters which they have in common.

2. Were the two Epistles written by the author of the former and larger Epistle? This has been answered in the affirmative by some critics who do not believe St. John to have written the first Epistle: e. g. by Bretschneider and Paulus. Their arguments for the identity of the Writer of the three will serve, for us who believe the apostolicity of the former, a different purpose from that which they intended. But the usual opinion of those who have any doubts on the Authorship has taken a different form. Ascribing the first Epistle to St. John, they have given the two smaller ones to another writer; either to the Presbyter John, or to some other Christian teacher of this name, otherwise unknown to us. Another exception is found to this in the modern critics of the Tübingen school, Baur and Schwegler, whose method of proceeding I have briefly noticed in the Introduction to the former Epistle (§ i. par. 29), and need not further characterize.

3. It will now be my object to enumerate the ancient authorities, and to ascertain on which side they preponderate; whether for, or against, the authorship by the Apostle John.

Irenæus says: "John the disciple of the Lord urged their condemnation, willing that we should not even say good speed to them: for, he says, he that biddeth them good speed partaketh, &c." (2 John 10, 11.)

And in another place, already cited (ch. xix. § i. par. 4), he quotes 2 John 7, 8, supposing it to be taken from the first Epistle: but this very circumstance shews him to have had no suspicion that the two were written by different persons.

4. Clement of Alexandria, in a passage already cited above (ch. v. § i. par. 5), cites the first Epistle thus, "John, in his greater Epistle," . . . thereby shewing that he knew of more Epistles by that Apostle.

And again in the fragments of the Adumbrations, ed. Potter, p. 1011, he says, "The second Epistle of John, which is written to virgins, is most simple: it was written to a certain Babylonian lady named Electa."

5. Dionysius of Alexandria, in a passage quoted at length below in the Introduction to the Apocalypse (§ i. par. 48), noting that John never names himself in his writings, says, "Not even in the current second and third of John, though they are short Epistles, is John manifestly named, but is signified anonymously under the title 'the presbyter' (elder)." Whence it appears that Dionysius found no offence in the appellation "the presbyter," but rather a trace of St. John's manner not to name himself. No argument can be raised on the expression "current" that Dionysius doubted the genuineness of the two Epistles. Eusebius calls the first Epistle "the current first of John." All we can say of the expression is, that it gives the general sense of tradition.

Alexander of Alexandria cites 2 John 10, 11, with "as the blessed John ordered." And the subsequent Alexandrian writers shew no doubt on the subject.

Cyprian, in relating the opinions of the various bishops in the council at Carthage, relates that one Aurelius quoted from "John the Apostle in his Epistle," the words "If any come to you, &c.," 2 John 10.

He does not in his own writings cite either Epistle, nor does Tertullian. But the above testimony shews that they were received as apostolic and canonical in the North African church.

6. The Muratorian fragment on the canon speaks enigmatically, owing partly to some words in the sentence being corrupt: "The Epistle of Jude and two superscribed 'Of John' are held among catholic Scripture, and 'Wisdom,' written by friends of Solomon in his honour."

Lücke, Huther, and others, find here a testimony for the Epistles: Düsterdieck on the contrary understands the sentence as meaning that they were not written by John, just as the Wisdom was not written by Solomon.

Most probably the Peschito, or ancient Syriac version, did not contain either Epistle. Cosmas Indicopleustes (Cent. vi.) says that in his time the Syrian church acknowledged but three catholic Epistles, 1 Peter,

1 John, and James. Still, Ephrem Syrus quotes the second Epistle, as also 2 Peter (see Introduction to 2 Pet. § iv. 13) and Jude: possessing them probably, as he did not understand Greek, in another Syriac version.

7. Eusebius reckons both Epistles among the disputed books: saying, "Among the disputed books are . . . that named the second, and third of John, whether they belong to the Evangelist, or to some one else of the same name."

Still, Eusebius's own opinion may be gathered from another passage, where he says of St. John, "In his Epistles he does not even make mention of his own name, or calls himself presbyter (elder), but never Apostle or Evangelist." Whence it would appear that he received the two smaller Epistles as genuine.

8. Origen mentions them with a similar expression of doubt.

9. Theodore of Mopsuestia, if we are thus to interpret Leontius of Byzantium (see above, ch. iii. § iv. 11), rejected these in common with the other catholic Epistles.

10. Theodoret makes no mention of them.

11. In a Homily on Matt. xxi. 23 ascribed to Chrysostom, but written probably by some Antiochene contemporary of his, we read, "But the second and the third the fathers exclude from the canon."

12. Jerome says, "John wrote one Epistle which is approved by all ecclesiastical and learned men; but the other two, of which the beginning is 'the elder,' are ascribed to John the Presbyter, whose tomb, besides that of St. John, is to this day shewn at Ephesus."

13. In the middle ages there seems to have been no doubt on the authenticity of the Epistles, till Erasmus revived the idea of their being the work of John the Presbyter. This view, grounded on the fact that the Writer names himself "the Presbyter," has been often maintained since: e. g. by Grotius, Beck, Fritzsche, and others.

14. If we take into strict account the import of this appellation, it will appear, as Lücke, Huther, and Düsterdieck have maintained, to make rather for than against the authorship by St. John. For in the first place, assuming, which is very doubtful, the existence of such a person as John the Presbyter, this name could only have been given him by those who wished to distinguish him from the Apostle, and would never have been assumed by himself as a personal one, seeing that he bore it in common with many others his co-presbyters.

15. Again, such an appellation is not without example as used of Apostles, and might bear two possible senses, either of which would here be preferable to the one just impugned. In the very fragment of Papias from which the existence of the presbyter John is inferred, he several times uses the term presbyter of Apostles and apostolic men as a class. He tells of "the things which he had learned from the presbyters (elders):" he says that if he met with any one who had conversed with "the presbyters" ("elders"), he enquired about "the sayings of the presbyters" ("elders"). Here it is certain that the term "presbyter" must not be taken officially, but of priority in time and dignity: it bears that meaning from which its official sense was derived, not that official sense itself.

16. And this leads us to the other meaning, that of the old age of the Writer<sup>8</sup>. St. Paul in Philem. 9, calls himself "Paul the aged" (presbytēs) in this sense: and "presbyteros" is but another form of the same word, though a form carrying a different possible meaning.

17. It is impossible to decide for which of these reasons the Apostle might choose thus to designate himself, or whether any other existed of which we are not aware. But we may safely say that inasmuch as St. Peter (1 Pet. v. 1), writing to the presbyters, calls himself their fellow-presbyter, there was no reason why St. John might not thus have designated himself. And we may hence lay down that the occurrence of such a word, as pointing out the Writer of these Epistles, is no reason against their having been written by that Apostle.

18. On the whole then we infer, from the testimony of the ancient Fathers, and from the absence of sufficient reason for understanding the title "presbyter" of any other person than the Apostle himself, that these two smaller Epistles were written by St. John the Apostle and Evangelist.

SECTION II.

FOR WHAT READERS WRITTEN.

1. The third Epistle leaves no doubt on this question. It is addressed to one Gaius (Caius). Whether this Caius is identical with Gaius of Macedonia (Acts xix. 29), with Gaius of Corinth (1 Cor. i. 14; Rom. xvi. 23), or with Gaius of Derbe (Acts xx. 4), it is impossible to say. The name was one of the commonest: and it is possible, as Lücke remarks, that the persons of St. John's period of apostolic work in Asia may have been altogether different from those of St. Paul's period. A Caius is mentioned in the Apostolic Constitutions as bishop of Pergamus: and Mill and Whiston believe this person to be addressed in our Epistle.

2. It is not so plain to whom the second Epistle was written. The address is in the Greek to "eclecté Kyria and her children:" "thy children" are mentioned in ver. 4: Kyria in the vocative occurs ver. 5: "the children of thine elect sister" are mentioned as sending greeting, ver. 13.

3. On these data the following doubts arise. Is it an individual lady who is addressed? And if so, is either of the two words a proper name, Eclecté or Kyria, and which? Or is it a church, thus called figuratively? And if so, is it some particular body of Christians, or the Church universal?

4. These questions were variously answered even in ancient times. The Scholiast says, "Either to a church, or to some woman ruling her house spiritually by the evangelic commandments." We have also in Ecumenius and Theophylact, as a comment on the last verse of the Epistle, "Some maintain on this account that the Epistle is written not to a woman, but to a church: which matter we do not wish to dispute." The individual hypothesis has been held in its various forms by numerous Commentators: there is a tradition that she was named Drusia or Drusiana: and a conjecture that she was Martha the sister of Lazarus and Mary. Another conjecture has been, that she was Mary, the mother of our Lord.

5. On the other hand, the ecclesiastical hypothesis has been held by Jerome, taking the words as meaning the whole Christian church:—so also apparently Clement of Alexandria, as cited above, ch. v. § i. par. 5: "Some wish on this account to prove that the Epistle was not written to a woman, but to a church." Some have carried conjecture so far as to designate the particular church addressed: e. g., Serrarius, supposing the Caius of the third Epistle to have belonged to this church, and that it consequently was at Corinth: Whiston, arguing for Philadelphia: Whitby, for Jerusalem, as being the Lady, the mother of all churches: Augusti, for the same, as being founded by our Lord Himself.

6. In now proceeding to examine these various opinions, I have maintained in the corresponding place in the Prolegomena to my Greek Test., that no argument can fairly be founded on grammatical considerations, which suit one hypothesis as well as the other.

7. In weighing the probability of either hypothesis, the following considerations are of importance. It would seem, as I have remarked in my note on ver. 13, as if the salutation there rather favoured the idea of a church being addressed, because we have no mention there of the elect sister herself, but only of her children. But then we must set against this the fact, that in the process of the Epistle itself, the Kyria (lady) herself does distinctly appear and is personally addressed. It would be, to say the least, strange, to address the whole church in the one case, and not to send greeting from the whole church in the other.

8. Again, would it have been likely that the salutation should have run, "The children of thy elect sister greet thee," if the Kyria had been a mere abstraction? Does not this personal address, as well as that in ver. 5, "And now I beseech thee, Kyria," imply personal reality of existence?

9. Let us, again, compare the address of this Epistle with that of the third, confessedly by the same Writer. The one runs, "The elder [to Gaius the beloved], whom I love in the truth." The other, "The elder [to electé Kyria and her children], whom I love in the truth." Can any one persuade us that the well-known simplicity of St. John's character and style would allow him thus to write these two addresses, word for word the same, and not to have in the words enclosed in brackets a like reference to existing persons in both cases?

10. Besides, as Lücke has well observed, we are not justified in thus attributing to St. John a mystic and unaccountable mode of expression, not found in any other writer of the apostolic age, nor indeed even in the apocryphal writings which followed it.

11. St. Peter's expression, "She that is elected with you in Babylon," 1 Pet. v. 13, even if understood of a church, which I have questioned in my note at the place, would not justify a like interpretation of "Kyria" here: though in the use of "elect" the passages are closely connected. If a person be addressed here, it is highly probable that we must understand a person there also: if a church be conceded to be addressed there, we have still the strange and unaccountable "Kyria" to deal with here<sup>9</sup>.

12. On all these grounds I believe that an individual and not a church is addressed. And if so, first, is either of the words "Electé" or "Kyria" a proper name? We may safely answer this in the affirmative, for a reason deduced from the construction in the Greek.

13. Then if so, which of the two words is the proper name? Here again there can be little doubt, if we compare "Electé Kyria" with "thy sister who is Electé." Both sisters were elect: but both had not the same name. Hence it would appear, that Electé is not the name, but an epithet. And if so, then KYRIA is the name, and ought perhaps to be substituted for the rendering "lady" in the notes. The name is elsewhere found. We have an inscription mentioning "Phenippus and his wife Kyria," and other examples of its occurrence.

14. This Kyria then appears to have been a Christian matron generally known and beloved among the brethren, having children, some of whom the Apostle had found (at a previous visit to her?) walking in the truth. She had a sister, also a Christian matron, whose children seem to have been with the Apostle when he wrote this Epistle.

15. In the third Epistle, mention is made of Demetrius with praise, and of Diotrephes with blame, as a turbulent person, and a withstander of the Apostle's authority. But it is quite in vain to enquire further into the facts connected with these names. We know nothing of them, and conjectures are idle.

16. On the occasion and object of these Epistles, it is hardly needful to remark. Both are too plainly declared in the letters themselves, to require further elucidation.

SECTION III.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.

1. It is impossible to lay down either of these with any degree of certainty. From the similarity in style of both Epistles, it is probable that the times of writing were not far apart. The journeys mentioned in 2 John 12 and 3 John 10, 14, may be one and the same. Eusebius relates that the Apostle, "when he returned from his exile in the island after Domitian's death, . . . made a journey by invitation to the neighbouring Gentiles, in some places to appoint bishops, in others to set in order whole churches, in others again to ordain some one of them pointed out by the Spirit." It may have been in prospect of this journey that he threatens Diotrephes in 2 John 10. If so, both Epistles belong to a very late period of the Apostle's life: and are probably subsequent to the writing of the Apocalypse. See below in the Introduction to that book, § ii. par. 7.

2. With regard to the place of writing, probability points to Ephesus: especially if we adopt the view suggested by the passage of Eusebius just cited.

CHAPTER XXI.

JUDE.

ITS AUTHORSHIP.

1. THE author of this Epistle calls himself, in ver. 1, "servant of Jesus Christ," and "brother of James." The former of these appellations is never thus barely used, in an address of an epistle, to designate an Apostle. It is true that in Phil. i. 1 we have "Paul and Timotheus servants of Jesus Christ:" but a designation common to two persons necessarily sinks to the rank of the inferior one. In every other case where an Apostle names himself "servant," it is in conjunction with "Apostle;" see Rom. i. 1; Tit. i. 1; 2 Pet. i. 1<sup>1</sup>. That I see no exception to this in James i. 1, is plain to the readers of my Introduction to that Epistle.

2. That an Apostle may have thus designated himself, we of course cannot deny; but we deal with analogy and probability in discussing evidence of this kind.

3. The second designation, "brother of James," still further confirms the view that the Writer is not an Apostle. Whoever this James may be, it is extremely improbable, that an Apostle of the Lord should have put forward in the opening of an Epistle of solemn warning and exhortation, not his exalted commission from Christ himself, but his mere earthly relationship to one who was better known than himself.

4. But this is met by some with the allegation, that we have elsewhere the Apostle Judas called [the brother] of James, "Jude of James," Luke vi. 16; Acts i. 13. Even were this so (and it is uncertain whether we are making the right supplement; see note on Matt. x. 2), that designation must stand on its own independent ground, and being mere matter of conjecture, cannot claim to enter as evidence here. If the considerations arising from this Epistle itself tend to shew that the Jude who wrote it was not an Apostle, then either we must 1) otherwise fill up the ellipsis in that expression, or 2) leave that difficult appellation in entire uncertainty. From the nature of the case, this must rule that other, not that other, this.

5. The question for us is, How would the probability arise, that any one should call himself "brother of James?" and the reply to this will depend somewhat on the personal dignity of the James here mentioned. If this person be assumed to be the well-known bishop of the church at Jerusalem, then there will be no difficulty in the Writer of this Epistle thus designating himself.

6. And this has been the general supposition. Those who see in that James, the Apostle James, son of Alphæus, regard our Writer as the Apostle Jude, also the son of Alphæus: the "Judas not Iscariot" of John xiv. 22. Those, on the other hand, who see in that James, not one of the Twelve, but the actual (maternal) brother of our Lord, the son of Joseph and Mary, regard our Writer as the Judas of Matt. xiii. 55, another brother of our Lord, and a younger son of Joseph and Mary.

<sup>1</sup> St. Paul in Philem. 1 calls himself merely "prisoner of Jesus Christ," but obviously both the name and the circumstances are widely different.

7. The reader will at once gather from what has been said in the Introduction to the Epistle of James, that this latter is the view here taken. The other seems to me to be beset with insuperable difficulties: involving us as it does in the wholly unjustifiable hypothesis, that those who are called in Scripture the brethren of our Lord were not his brethren, but his cousins, sons of Alphæus (Clopas).

8. It may be asked, if this Writer were indeed the brother of James, and thus the brother of the Lord Himself, should we not rather expect that he would give himself this high character, stating his relationship to Jesus, rather than that to James? But surely such a question would shew great ignorance of the true spirit of the apostolic writers. It would be the last thing I should expect, to find one of the brethren of the Lord asserting this relationship as a ground of reception for an Epistle. Almost all agree that the Writer of the Epistle of James was the person known as the brother of the Lord. Yet there we have no such designation. It would have been in fact altogether inconsistent with the true spirit of Christ (see Luke xi. 27, 28), and in harmony with those later and superstitious feelings with which the next and following ages regarded His earthly relatives. Had such a designation as "brother of the Lord" been found in the address of an Epistle, it would have formed a strong à priori objection to its authenticity.

9. I have before remarked in the Introduction to 2 Peter that such expressions as that in our ver. 17, "Remember the words which were before spoken by the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ," cannot be fairly alleged as evidence of the apostolicity or non-apostolicity of a writer<sup>2</sup>.

10. Of this Judas, one of the Lord's brethren, we know nothing from early ecclesiastical tradition. The only trace of him is found in an interesting story which Eusebius gives from Hegesippus, of Domitian, in jealousy of the survivors of the family of David, sending for and examining two grandsons of this Judas, and dismissing them, on finding that they were poor working men, and hearing that the kingdom of Christ which they expected was not to be in this present world.

11. In this defect of our knowledge of the personal history of the Writer, we can only say that he, like his greater brother St. James, did not believe on our Lord during his ministry, but became a convert after the resurrection, and as in Acts i. 14, consorted usually with the Apostles and followers of Jesus. All else respecting him is left to be gathered from the spirit and style of this Epistle: and will be found treated in the section devoted to that part of our subject.

AUTHENTICITY.

1. Eusebius reckons our Epistle, as indeed all the Catholic Epistles except 1 John and 1 Peter, among the disputed books: "Among the disputed books, but still known to most, are the so-called Epistle of James and that of Jude" . . . .

And again: "Not many of the ancients have mentioned it, as neither that called the Epistle of Jude, which is also one of the seven so-called catholic: but yet we know that these are publicly read with the rest in most of the churches."

2. Tertullian however cites it as authentic, and attributes it to the Apostle Jude: "Enoch has a testimony in the writing of the Apostle Jude."

3. Clement of Alexandria gives citations from it as from Scripture: "With regard to these and the like heresies I believe Jude in his Epistle to have spoken prophetically" . . . (citing our vv. 8, 17).

And again: "'For I wish you to know,' says Jude, 'that God having saved the people out of the land of Egypt'" . . . (vv. 5, 6).

And Eusebius says of Clement, "that he made expositions of the whole canonical Scripture, not even omitting the disputed books, I mean that of Jude and the other catholic Epistles, and that of Barnabas, and that which is called the Apocalypse of Peter."

4. The Muratorian fragment speaks of the Epistle as genuine and canonical.

5. Origen says: "Jude wrote an Epistle of few lines, but full of speeches strong in heavenly grace; and he says in his prologue, 'Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James.'"

And he refers to it in several places as Scripture; calling the Writer in one place, "Jude the Apostle."

6. Jerome says: "Jude the brother of James has left a short Epistle, which is one of the seven catholic ones. And because he adduces a testimony from the book of Enoch, which is apocryphal, the Epistle is, by most, rejected; still it has gotten authority by long usage, so as to be reckoned among the other Scriptures."

7. In the older copies of the Peschito, or ancient Syriac version, the Epistle is wanting; but Ephrem Syrus recognized its authenticity.

8. In later times, the Epistle has been generally received as authentic. The circumstance that the Writer does not call himself an Apostle, has ensured for it a more favourable reception than some other books of the New Test., with those who are fond of questioning the genuineness of the Epistles. Even De Wette thinks there is no reason why we should suspect it to be spurious. He is willing to pass over the phenomena in it which have appeared stumbling-blocks to others: its citation of the book of Enoch, its probable acquaintance with the Epistle to the Romans, its difficult but apparently Greek style.

9. Schweigler, on the other hand, though acknowledging its very simple and undeveloped character in point of doctrine, yet draws from vv. 17, 18 a proof that it belongs to the post-apostolic times. He thinks that the forger prefixed the name of Jude, brother of James, in order to give to his writing the weight of connexion, in point of doctrine and spirit, with this latter great name.

10. But as Huther well remarks, had this been so;—in other words, for so the hypothesis seems to imply, had the Epistle been written in the interests of Judaizing Christianity against Pauline, we should surely have found more indications of this in it: and as to the superscription we may reply, that a forger would hardly have attributed his composition to a man otherwise so entirely unknown as Jude was.

11. The fact that doubts were entertained respecting the authenticity of the Epistle in early times, and that we do not find many traces of its use in the primitive Fathers, may easily be accounted for from its shortness, from its special character, from its presumed reference to apocryphal sources, from its apparently not being written by an Apostle.

SECTION III.

FOR WHAT READERS AND WITH WHAT OBJECT WRITTEN.

1. The readers are addressed merely as Christians: perhaps, as De Wette suggests, because the matters mentioned in the Epistle are little to their credit. The evil persons stigmatized in it do not seem to have been heretical teachers, as commonly supposed, but rather libertines, practical unbelievers (vv. 4, 8), scoffers (ver. 18), whose pride and wantonness (vv. 8, 10, 12 f.), whose murmuring, and refractory and party spirit (vv. 11, 16, 19), threatened to bring about the destruction of the church. In 2 Peter, as I have already observed above, ch. iv. § iii. 4, these persons are developed into false teachers: one of the circumstances from which I have inferred the posteriority of that Epistle.

2. It is mainly to warn his readers against these, that St. Jude writes the Epistle: “to exhort them that they should contend earnestly for the faith once,” and once for all, “delivered to the saints.”

3. When we come to ask whether the readers formed a circumscribed circle of Christians, and if so, where, we find ourselves left to mere speculation for an answer. There does certainly appear to be a speciality about the circumstances of those addressed, but it is difficult exactly to define it. They seem to have been Jews, from the fact of the altogether Judaic spirit of the Epistle : from its appeal to Jewish traditions, and perhaps to Jewish books. They evidently dwelt among an abundant and a wicked population, probably of a commercial character. Hence some have thought of Corinth as their abode : some of Egypt, to which land it is said the physical phenomena are suitable (vv. 12 ff.) : some of a commercial city in Syria, seeing that Palestine, where St. Jude dwelt, must at the time of writing the Epistle have been in a state of commotion, to which there is no allusion in it.

SECTION IV.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.

1. On the former of these it is impossible to speak with any degree of certainty. Our principal indications are, the state of the church which may be inferred from the Epistle, the apparent use made in it of the apocryphal book of Enoch, and the reference made to the previous teaching of the Apostles.

2. The state of the church indicated is one not far advanced in historical development. Those errors which afterwards expanded into heresies were as yet in their first stage. The evil men were as yet mixed with the church, rocks of danger in their feasts of love. They had not yet been marked off and stigmatized : for this very purpose the Epistle is written, that they might no longer be latent in the bosom of the church. All this points to an early date.

3. The datum furnished by the apparent allusion to the apocryphal book of Enoch, guides us to no certain result. It is even yet matter of uncertainty, when that book was written<sup>3</sup>. So that this consideration brings us no nearer to our desired result.

4. The fact that St. Jude (ver. 17) refers his readers to previous teaching by the Apostles, is hardly of more value for our purpose. On the one hand the imperfect tense (ver. 18) seems to speak of the Apostles as if their work was done and they were passed away,—“they used to tell you :” on the other, it might fairly be used of men who were dispersed and carrying on their work in other parts. Then again, the language seems necessarily to imply that the readers had for themselves heard the Apostles. No safe inference can be drawn from the words that they were written after the apostolic age : nay, the natural inference is rather the other way. They appear to point to a time when the agency of the Apostles themselves had passed away from the readers, but the impress of their warning words had not faded from their memories.

5. Another note of time has been imagined to lie in the circumstance, that the destruction of Jerusalem is not mentioned in the Epistle. It has been replied, that there was no reason why any allusion should have been made to that event, as the immediate subject before the Writer did not lead him to it. Still I cannot help feeling that the reply is not wholly satisfactory. Considering that St. Jude was writing to Jews, and citing signal instances of divine vengeance, though he may not have been led to mention the judgment of the Flood,—I can hardly conceive that he would have omitted that which uprooted the Jewish people and polity.

6. So that on the whole, as De Wette, himself often sceptical on the question of the genuineness and antiquity of the New Test. writings, confesses, there is no reason why we should place our Epistle later than the limit of the apostolic age. That it was anterior to the second Epistle of Peter, I have already endeavoured to prove (see above, ch. iv. § iii. 3 ff.).

7. Of the place where this Epistle was written, absolutely nothing is known. From its tone and references, we should conjecture that the Writer lived in Palestine: but even thus much must be uncertain.

SECTION V.

ON THE APOCRYPHAL WRITINGS APPARENTLY REFERRED TO IN THIS EPISTLE.

1. In ver. 14 we have a reference to a prophecy of Enoch, the seventh from Adam. This has by many been supposed to indicate an acquaintance on the part of the Writer with the existing apocryphal “book of Enoch.” It becomes desirable therefore that we should briefly put the student in possession of the history and nature of that document. In so doing I shall take my matter partly from Mr. Westcott’s article in Dr. Smith’s Biblical Dictionary, partly from a notice by Professor Volkmar (see below): to which sources the reader is referred for further details.

2. The book appears to have been known to the early fathers, Justin, Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen, and we have numerous references to it in the “Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs.” Tertulian quotes it as a book not admitted into the Jewish canon, but profitable, and indeed to be received by Christians on the ground that “nothing is to be altogether rejected which has reference to ourselves,” and that "we read that all Scripture (or, every writing) fit for edification is divinely inspired." Augustine was acquainted with it, as also was an anonymous writer whose work is printed among those of Jerome: but during the middle ages it was known to the Western Church only through the (presumed) quotations in our Epistle. The Eastern Church possessed considerable fragments of it, incorporated into the Chronographia of Georgius Syncellus (about 792).

3. About the close of the last century, the traveller Bruce brought from Abyssinia the Æthiopic translation of the entire book. An English version of this translation was published by Archbishop Lawrence in 1821; and the Æthiopic itself in 1838. Since then a more complete edition has been published in Germany (by Dr. A. Dillmann, Leipzig, 1853), which is now the standard one, and has given rise to the Essays, among others, of Ewald and Hilgenfeld.

4. The Æthiopic version appears to have been made from the Greek; as, though wanting a considerable passage quoted by Syncellus, it yet agrees in the main with the citations found in the early Fathers. But it is probable that the Greek itself is but a version of a Hebrew original. The names of the angels and of the winds betray an Aramaic origin: and a Hebrew book of Enoch was known and used by the Jews as late as the thirteenth century.

5. The book consists of revelations purporting to have been given to Enoch and to Noah: and its object is, to vindicate the ways of Divine Providence: to set forth the terrible retribution reserved for sinners, whether angelic or human: and to "repeat in every form the great principle that the world, natural, moral and spiritual, is under the immediate government of God."

6. "In doctrine," says Mr. Westcott in the article above mentioned, "the book of Enoch exhibits a great advance of thought within the limits of revelation in each of the great divisions of knowledge. The teaching on nature is a curious attempt to reduce the scattered images of the Old Test. to a physical system. The view of society and man, of the temporary triumph and final discomfiture of the oppressors of God's people, carries out into elaborate detail the pregnant images of Daniel. The figure of the Messiah is invested with majestic dignity as 'the Son of God,' 'whose name was named before the sun was made,' and who existed 'aforetime in the presence of God.' And at the same time his human attributes as 'the son of man,' 'the son of woman,' 'the elect one,' 'the righteous one,' 'the anointed,' are brought into conspicuous notice. The mysteries of the spiritual world, the connexion of angels and men, the classes and ministries of the hosts of heaven, the power of Satan, and the legions of darkness, the doctrines of resurrection, retribution, and eternal punishment, are dwelt upon with growing earnestness as the horizon of speculation was extended by intercourse with Greece. But the message of the book is emphatically one of faith and truth: and while the Writer combines and repeats the thoughts of Scripture, he adds no new element to the teaching of the prophets. His errors spring from an undisciplined attempt to explain their words, and from a proud exultation in present success. For the great characteristic by which the book is distinguished from the later apocalypse of Esdras is the tone of triumphant expectation by which it is pervaded."

7. The date of the book has been matter of great uncertainty. Abp. Lawrence, and Hofmann, suppose it to have been compiled in the reign of Herod the Great: and with this view Gfrörer, Wieseler, and Gieseler agree. Lücke goes very fully into the question, and determines that it consists of an earlier and a later portion: the former written early in the Maccabæan period, the latter in the time of Herod the Great. It is from the former of these that the quotation in our Epistle is taken.

8. But the whole question of the date has been recently discussed by Prof. Volkmar, of Zurich. He undertakes to prove the book a production of the time of the sedition of Barchochebas (A.D. about 132), and to have been written by one of the followers of Rabbi Akiba, the great upholder of that impostor. And certainly, as far as I can see, his proof seems not easy to overthrow. In that case, as he remarks, the book of Enoch was not only of Jewish, but of distinctly antichristian origin. But this one point in the progress of his argument seems to me debatable. He assumes that the words cited in our Epistle as a prophecy of Enoch are of necessity taken from the apocryphal book, and regards it as an inevitable sequence, that if the book of Enoch is proved to be of the first half of the second century, the Epistle of Jude must be even later. In order however for this to be accepted, we need one link supplied, which, it seems to me, Prof. Volkmar has not given us. We want it shewn, that the passage cited is so interwoven into the apocryphal book as necessarily to form a part of it, and that it may not itself have been taken from primitive tradition, or even from the report of that tradition contained in our Epistle.

9. The account of the matter hence deduced would be, that the book, in its original groundwork, is of purely Jewish origin, but that it has received numerous Christian interpolations and additions. "It may be regarded," remarks Mr. Westcott, "as describing an important phase of Jewish opinion shortly before the coming of Christ." If we accept the later date, this must of course be modified accordingly.

There never has been in the church the slightest doubt of the apocryphal character of the book of Enoch. The sole maintainer of its authority seems to have been Tertullian: it is plainly described as apocryphal by Origen, Augustine, and Jerome, and is enumerated among the apocryphal books in the Apostolical Constitutions.

10. The other passage in our Epistle which has been supposed to come from an apocryphal source, viz. the reference to the dispute between the archangel Michael and the devil concerning the body of Moses, has been discussed in the notes on the place, and held more likely to have been a fragment of primitive tradition.

11. But it yet remains that something should be said concerning the fall of the angels spoken of vv. 6, 7. In the notes on those verses, I have mentioned the probability, in my view, that the narrative in Gen. vi. 2 is alluded to. This impression has been since then much strengthened by a very able polemical tract by Dr. Kurtz, the author of the "History of the Old Testament," in which he has maintained against Hengstenberg the view taken by himself in that work. It seems to me that Dr. Kurtz has gone far to decide the interpretation as against any reference of Gen. vi. 2 to the Sethites, or of our vv. 6, 7 to the fall of the devil and his angels. The exposition of Hengstenberg and those who think with him depends on the spiritual acceptation, in this case, of the word "fornication," which Kurtz completely disproves. The facts of the history of the catastrophe of the cities of the plain render it quite out of the question: and the usage of the Septuagint, which Hengstenberg cites as decisive on his side, is really against him. And this point being disposed of, the whole fabric falls with it.

12. That the particulars related in 2 Pet. and our Epistle of the fallen angels are found also in the book of Enoch, is again no proof that the Writers of these Epistles took them from that book. Three other solutions are possible: 1, that the apocryphal Writer took them from our Epistles: 2, that their source in each case was ancient tradition: 3, that the book of Enoch itself consists of separate portions written at different times.

CHAPTER XXII.

REVELATION.

AUTHORSHIP AND CANONICITY.

1. THE Author of this book calls himself in more places than one by the name John, ch. i. 1, 4, 9, xxii. 8. The general view has been, that this name represents St. John the son of Zebedee, the Writer of the Gospel and the three Epistles, the disciple whom Jesus loved.

2. This view rests on external, and on internal evidence. I shall first specify both these, and then pass on to other views respecting the authorship. And in so doing, I shall at present cite merely those testimonies which bear more or less directly on the authorship. The most ancient are the following :

3. Justin Martyr, in his dialogue with Trypho the Jew (written between A.D. 139 and 161): "And . . . among us a certain man named John, one of the Apostles of Christ, in the Apocalypse which was made to him prophesied that those who have believed in our time shall spend a thousand years in Jerusalem, and after this the universal and in a word eternal resurrection and judgment of all together shall take place."

We may mention by the way, that this testimony of Justin is doubly important, as referred to by Eusebius, himself no believer in the apostolic authorship: "Justin has made mention of the Apocalypse of John, plainly stating it to be by the Apostle."

The authenticity and value of the passage of Justin has been discussed at considerable length and with much candour by Lücke. He, himself a disbeliever in St. John's authorship, confesses that it is a genuine and decided testimony in its favour.

4. Melito, bishop of Sardis (died about 171), is said by Eusebius to have written treatises on the devil, and on the Apocalypse of John. It is fairly reasoned that Eusebius would hardly have failed to notice, supposing him to have seen Melito's work, any view of his which doubted the apostolic origin: and that this may therefore be legitimately taken as an indirect testimony in its favour.

5. Of a similar indirect nature are the two next testimonies. Theophilus, bishop of Antioch (died about 180), is said by Eusebius to have written a book entitled "Against the heresy of Hermogenes," in which he uses testimonies from the Apocalypse of John.

6. And similarly Eusebius says of Apollonius, who flourished in Asia Minor at the end of cent. ii., and wrote against the Montanists, thereby making his testimony more important: "He also uses testimonies from the Apocalypse of John: and he relates that a dead man was raised miraculously by John himself in Ephesus." From this latter sentence there can be no doubt that Apollonius regarded the Apocalypse as the work of John the Apostle.

7. We now come to the principal second century witness, Irenæus (died about 180). Respecting the value of his testimony, it may suffice to remind the student that he had been a hearer of Polycarp, the disciple of St. John. And this testimony occurs up and down his writings in great abundance, and in the most decisive terms. "John the Disciple of the Lord," is stated by him in four places to have written the Apocalypse, —and "John" in two places. And this John can be no other than the Apostle: for he says, "John the Disciple of the Lord (as above), who lay upon His breast, himself published the gospel when he resided in Ephesus of Asia." But the most remarkable testimony, and one which will come before us again and again during the course of this Introduction, is in a passage, where, having given certain reasons for the number of Antichrist's name being 666, he proceeds, "Now this being so, and this number being found in all the good and ancient copies, and being testified to by those very men who have seen John face to face . . . ." Then after some remarks, and stating two names current as suiting the number, he concludes, "We indeed do not venture positively to demonstrate concerning the name of Antichrist. For if it had been fitting for his name to be openly revealed to this age, it would have been declared by him who saw the Apocalypse. For it was seen not long ago, but close upon our own generation, near the end of the reign of Domitian."

This is beyond question the most important evidence which has yet come before us. And we may observe that it is in no way affected by any opinion which we may have formed respecting Irenæus's merits as an expositor, nor by any of his peculiar opinions. He here merely asserts what, if he were a man of ordinary power of collecting and retaining facts, he must very well have known for certain.

8. Keeping at present to the direct witnesses for the authorship by St. John, we next come to Tertullian (died about 220). His testimonies are many and decisive.

"For also the Apostle John in the Apocalypse describes a sword proceeding out of the mouth of our Lord:" and again, "This (celestial city) Ezekiel was acquainted with, and the Apostle John saw." And similarly in six other places.

9. The fragment on the Canon called by the name of Muratori, and written about 200, says, "And John in the Apocalypse, though he writes to seven churches, yet speaks to all . . .," where the context shews that the Apostle John must be intended.

10. Hippolytus, bishop of Ostia (Porto), about 240, in his writings very frequently quotes the Apocalypse, and almost always with the words, "John says." Whom he meant by John is evident from one passage: "Tell me, blessed John, Apostle and Disciple of the Lord, what thou sawest and heardest concerning Babylon." And then he proceeds to quote ch. xvii. 1—18. Multitudes of other citations also occur. And one of his principal works, as specified in the catalogue found inscribed on his statue, was a defence of the Gospel and Apocalypse of John: mentioned also by Jerome.

11. Clement of Alexandria (about 200) says of the faithful presbyter, "Their presbyter . . . shall sit on the twenty-and-four thrones, as John says in the Apocalypse." And elsewhere he fixes this name as meaning the Apostle, by saying, "Hear a story,—not a story but a true history,— delivered down respecting the Apostle John . . . for when at the death of the tyrant he moved from the island Patmos to Ephesus . . . ?” and then he proceeds to tell the well-known story of St. John and the young robber.

12. Origen, the scholar of Clement (died about 233), who so diligently enquired into and reported any doubts or disputes about the canonicity and genuineness of the books of the New Test., appears not to have known of any which regarded the Apocalypse. He says, “Why should we speak of him who lay on the breast of Jesus, namely John, who has left us one Gospel, and confesses that he might have made so many, that the world could not hold them? He wrote also the Apocalypse, and was ordered to be silent and not to write the voices of the seven thunders.”

We have also this remarkable testimony of his: “And the sons of Zebedee were baptized with the baptism: for Herod killed James the brother of John with the sword: and the king of the Romans, as tradition teaches us, condemned John, a martyr for the word of the truth, to the island of Patmos, and John tells us about his martyrdom, not saying who condemned him, declaring in his Apocalypse thus, ‘I John,’ &c. (Rev. i. 9), and what follows. He seems to have seen the Apocalypse in this island.”

And Origen again repeatedly cites the Apocalypse without the least indication of doubt as to its author. His procedure in this case forms a striking contrast to that in the case of the Epistle to the Hebrews: see this Introduction, ch. xv. § i. 16—23.

13. Still keeping to those Fathers who give definite testimony as to the authorship, we come to Victorinus, bishop of Pettau in Pannonia, who suffered martyrdom under Diocletian in 303. His is the earliest extant commentary on the Apocalypse. On ch. x. 4, he says that “John, himself an Apostle, was forbidden, when he was going to write what the seven thunders had said.”

And afterwards, on the words “thou must prophesy again,” he says, “When John saw this, he was in the island Patmos, condemned to the mines by the Emperor Domitian. There he saw the Apocalypse: and when he in his old age expected to receive his entrance (to glory) by martyrdom, Domitian was slain and all his decrees were abrogated, and John being set free from the mines, thus afterwards delivered down the Apocalypse which he had received.”

14. Ephrem Syrus (died about 378), the greatest Father in the Syrian church, repeatedly in his numerous writings cites the Apocalypse as canonical, and ascribes it to John. In the Greek translation of his works, we read in the second Homily on the Second Advent of the Lord, “as we hear the Apostle saying,” and then he quotes Rev. xxi. 4, 5.

Now these citations are the more remarkable, because the old Syriac or Peschito version does not contain the Apocalypse: as neither indeed apparently did the later or Philoxenian version originally, nor its republication by Thomas of Charkel. It may fairly be asked then, How came Ephrem by his Syriac version of the Apocalypse (for he seems not to have been acquainted with Greek)? And, How came the Peschito to want the Apocalypse, if it was held to be written by the Apostle?

15. It would exceed the limits of this Introduction to enter into the answers to these questions, which have been variously given: by Hug and Thiersch, that the Peschito originally contained the book, and that it only became excluded in the fourth century through the influence of the schools of Antioch and Nisibis: by Walton and Wichelhaus, that the Peschito was made in the first century, when as yet the Apocalypse had not won its way among the canonical books: by Hengstenberg, that the Peschito was not made till the end of the third century, after the objections against the apostolicity of the book had been raised by Dionysius of Alexandria<sup>4</sup>.

16. These answers are all discussed by Lücke, and severally rejected. His own solution is by no means satisfactory as to the former of the two questions,—how Ephrem came by his Syriac version. The latter he answers by postponing the date of the reception of the Apocalypse into the canon till after the publication of the Peschito, i. e. as now generally acknowledged, the end of the second century.

17. Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis in Cyprus at the end of the fourth century, cites the Apocalypse as written by the Apostle. In combating the Alogi, who rejected the gospel of John and the Apocalypse, he speaks much and warmly of that book, and says among other things, "The holy Prophets and the holy Apostles, among whom the holy John, by his Gospel and his Epistles and his Apocalypse, imparted of the same holy gift of grace:" and having cited 1 Cor. xv. 52, he proceeds, "Since then the Apostle agrees with the holy Apostle John in the Apocalypse, what controversy is left?"

18. Basil the Great (died 378) says, "That which was spoken to you by the Holy Spirit through the blessed John, 'In the beginning was the Word, &c.,' and afterwards, the Evangelist himself shews us the meaning of this was in another work, saying 'He that is and was and the Almighty,'" Rev. i. 8.

19. Hilary of Poitiers (died 368) says, "Thus we are taught by the Apocalypse of blessed John: 'And to the angel of the church of Philadelphia write.'" And similarly in two other places.

20. Athanasius (died 373) cites John i. 1, and then says, "And in the Apocalypse he says thus, 'He that is, and was, and is to come.'"

21. Gregory of Nyssa, brother of Basil the Great (died 395), cites Rev. iii. 15, as said by the Evangelist John.

22. Didymus (died 394) says, "And in the Apocalypse John (the writer of the Epistle, from the context) is often called a prophet."

23. Ambrose (died 397) constantly cites the Apocalypse as the work of the Apostle John.

24. Augustine (died 430) uses every where the Apocalypse as a genuine production of the Apostle and Evangelist John.

25. Jerome (died 420) speaks of the Apostle John as also being a prophet, "for he saw in the island Patmos, to which he had been banished by the Emperor Domitian, on account of his testimony to the Lord, the Apocalypse, containing infinite mysteries of future things."

We shall have to adduce Jerome again in treating of the canonicity. And now that we have arrived at the beginning of the fifth century, the latter question becomes historically the more important of the two, and indeed the two are henceforth hardly capable of being treated apart.

26. Before we pass to the testimonies against the authorship by the Apostle and Evangelist St. John, let us briefly review the course of evidence which we have adduced in its favour. It will be very instructive to compare its character with that of the evidence for the Pauline authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews, as collected in the Introduction to that Epistle.

27. There we found that, while there prevailed in the great majority of the more ancient Fathers a habit, when they are speaking loosely, or ad populum, of citing the Epistle as the work of St. Paul,—on the one hand, all attempts fail to discover any general ecclesiastical tradition to this effect: and on the other, the greatest and ablest of these writers themselves, when speaking guardedly, throw doubt on the Pauline authorship, while some of them set it aside altogether. In course of time, we there also found, the habit of citing the Epistle as St. Paul's became more general: then sprung up assertion, more and more strong, that it veritably was his: till at last it was made an article of faith to believe it to be so. So that the history of opinion in that case may be described as the gradual growing up of a belief which was entirely void of general reception in the ancient church.

28. We are not yet prepared to enter on the whole of the corresponding history of opinion in this case: but as far as we have gone, it may be described as the very converse of the other. The apostolic authorship rests on the firmest traditional ground. We have it assured to us by one who had companied with men that had known St. John himself: we have it held in continuous succession by Fathers in all parts of the church. Nowhere, in primitive times, does there appear any counter tradition on the subject. We have nothing corresponding to the plain testimonies, of Tertullian in favour of Barnabas, or of Origen that there was an account come down that Clement of Rome or St. Luke had written the Epistle. In subsequent paragraphs we shall see how variation of opinion was first introduced, and why.

29. But before doing so, it will be well to complete this portion of our enquiry, by mentioning those early writings and Fathers which, though they do not expressly state who was the author of the book, yet cite it as canonical, or at all events shew that they were acquainted with and approved it.

30. Among these the very earliest have been matter of considerable question. The supposed allusions in Polycarp, for instance, though strongly maintained by Hengstenberg, are really so faint and distant, that none but an advocate would ever have perceived them<sup>5</sup>.

31. The passages which Hengstenberg brings from the Epistle of the Church of Smyrna on the martyrdom of Polycarp, are even more uncertain and far-fetched. Such advocacy is much to be lamented: it tends to weaken instead of strengthening the real evidence.

32. But the next testimony produced is however of a very different kind. It is that of Papias, of whom Irenæus, in adducing the traditional words of our Lord respecting the millennial abundance of the earth, says, "These things Papias, having been a hearer of John, and companion of Polycarp, an ancient man, testifies in writing in the fourth of his books; for there are five compiled by him." It is well known that Eusebius attempts to set aside this hearer of John by citing from Papias himself his assertion that he set down in his work what he had heard as the sayings of the Apostles, naming St. John among them. But there is nothing to prevent his having united both characters,—that of a hearer, and that of a collector of sayings: and Irenæus, the scholar of Polycarp, is hardly likely to have been mistaken on such a point. Now regarding Papias as a witness for the Apocalypse, we have a note of Andreas, of Cappadocia, at the end of the fifth century, at the beginning of the commentaries on the Apocalypse: "Concerning the inspiration of the book we think it superfluous to enlarge, when the blessed men, Gregory the Theologian and Cyril, and besides, the more ancient men, Papias, Irenæus, Methodius, and Hippolytus, have given credible testimony to it; from whom we also, having taken many proofs, have arrived at the same conclusion, as we have set forth in certain places." And accordingly, on Rev. xii. 7—9, he expressly cites Papias's work.

33. There seems to be ample proof here that Papias did maintain, as from what we otherwise know we should expect, the inspiration, i. e. the canonicity of the book. All that has been argued on the other side seems to me to fail to obviate the fact, or to weaken the great importance of this early testimony. See the whole discussed at length in Stuart, pp. 250—254: Lücke, pp. 524—546: Hengstenberg, pp. 101—116. I may be permitted to say, that both the last-mentioned Commentators have suffered themselves to be blinded as to the real worth of the evidence by their zeal to serve each his own hypothesis.

34. The Epistle of the churches of Lyons and Vienne to the churches of Asia and Phrygia concerning the persecution which befell them under Marcus Aurelius, A.D. 177, is preserved by Eusebius. The citations in it from the Apocalypse are unmistakeable. In speaking of the martyr Vettius Epagathus, they say, "For he was and is a true martyr of Christ, following the Lamb whithersoever He goeth" (Rev. xiv. 4). They account for the rage of the Pagans against the Christians by its being the fulfilment of Rev. xxii. 11, "That the Scripture may be fulfilled, 'He that is lawless, let him be lawless still, and he that is righteous let him be righteous still.'" They call Christ "the faithful and true Witness," and, "the Firstborn from the dead," expressions manifestly taken from Rev. i. 5, iii. 14.

35. The testimony of Polycrates of Ephesus, in Euseb. H. E. v. 24, concerning the burial of St. John in Ephesus, has been pressed by Hengstenberg into the service of the canonicity of the Apocalypse, but is far too uncertain in meaning to be fairly introduced. See Hengstenberg, pp. 125—129.

36. Cyprian (about 250) repeatedly refers to the Apocalypse, and unhesitatingly treats it as part of Holy Scripture. He says, "chiefly when it is written, 'Remember whence thou hast fallen and repent,'" Rev. ii. 5. He cites the Apocalypse as on a level with the Gospels: "By the trumpet of His Gospel the Lord excites us, saying, 'He that loveth father, &c.' . . . and again, 'Blessed are they that shall be persecuted, &c.' . . . and, 'To him that overcometh will I give to sit upon my throne, &c.," Rev. iii. 21. And similarly in several other places, given in my Greek Test.

37. Athanasius<sup>6</sup> (died about 373) gives a list of the books of the sacred canon, dividing them into three classes: the first of these being the canonical, which are the sources of salvation: in which only is the true doctrine of religion declared, to which no man can add, and from which none can take away: the second ecclesiastical—such as may be read in the church for edification, but are not inspired: the third, apocryphal, written by heretics, and supposititious. In the first class he places the Apocalypse: and in his writings accordingly he refers to it frequently.

38. In Chrysostom's own works we have no comments on the Apocalypse, nor any distinct references to it as Scripture. That he was acquainted with it, plainly appears from such passages as that where in speaking of the heavenly city, he says, "Let us then notice its foundations, its gates composed of sapphire and pearls."

Suidas says, "Under the word 'John,' Chrysostom receives his three Epistles, and his Apocalypse."

39. I recur again to Jerome's testimony<sup>7</sup>. In his letter to Paulinus, he gives the whole sacred canon. And in including the Apocalypse in it, he remarks, "The Apocalypse of John has as many mysteries as words. I have said but little in proportion to the merit of the book. All praise is too little. In every word are hidden manifold wise senses." In his Commentary on Ps. cxlix. he says, "We read in the Apocalypse of John, which is read and received in the churches, for it is not reckoned among the apocryphal books, but among the canonical (ecclesiastical)."

In his Epistle to Dardanus we have the passage cited at length in the Introduction to the Epistle to the Hebrews, § i. par. 74, which see.

40. It is hardly worth while to cite later and less important authorities on this side. They will be found enumerated in Stuart, Introduction, p. 276 : Davidson, p. 545 : and still more at length in Lücke, pp. 638 ff. Of the general tendency of later tradition I shall speak below, parr. 63 ff.

41. I now come to consider those ancient authorities which impugn the apostolicity and canonicity of the book.

42. First among these in point of time, though not of importance, are the Antimontanists or Alogi of the end of the second and beginning of the third century, who rejected the writings of St. John. "Men like these," says Epiphanius, "are not ashamed to be up in arms against the sayings of the holy John, trying whether they cannot overthrow the truth itself; . . . and against the Apocalypse they bring these wanton charges. . . ." Then follow their objections against the book, which are entirely of a subjective character: "What is the use to me of the Apocalypse of John, talking about seven angels and seven trumpets?" and again, "There is no church of Christians in Thyatira. How then could he write to what never existed?" &c. To these apparently Dionysius of Alexandria, presently to be cited, alludes, when he says, "Some of those before me have set at nought and pulled to pieces the book in every way, examining it through every chapter, and shewing it to be obscure and unintelligible. And they say that the title is false, for it is not John's, and is not even a revelation at all, seeing that it is covered with a heavy and thick cloud of obscurity; and that not only none of the Apostles, but not even of men of the Catholic church, was the writer of the composition; but Cerinthus, who established the heresy called by his name, put the name, wishing to gain credit for his own composition. For that this was a doctrine of his, that the kingdom of Christ should be on this earth: and being himself a gross person and altogether carnal, he denied that future blessedness would consist in things of this kind."

43. I have considered it important to quote this passage at length, as giving an account of the earliest opponents to the authenticity of the Apocalypse, and of the reason of their opposition. These Alogi have been very lightly passed over by Lücke (p. 582) and others, who are not willing that their procession of opponents to the apostolic authorship should be led by persons whose character is so little creditable. But the fair enquirer will not feel at liberty thus to exclude them. They were perhaps more outspoken and thorough, perhaps also less learned and cautious than those who follow: but their motives of opposition were of the same kind; and it is especially to be noted, as a weighty point in the evidence, that, being hostile to the authority of the writings commonly received as those of the Apostle John, they in their time conceived it necessary to destroy the credit of the Apocalypse as well as that of the Gospel.

44. The Roman presbyter Caius, a very learned man according to Eusebius, who lived in the Episcopate of Zephyrinus (i.e. 196—219), wrote a polemical dialogue against the Montanist Proclus, of which a fragment has been preserved by Eusebius speaking out still more plainly, and saying that Cerinthus forged revelations in the name of a great Apostle, and pretended them to have been received from an angel, saying that after the resurrection there would be a kingdom of Christ upon earth, and that the flesh would again dwell in Jerusalem, and be subject to lusts and pleasures: and that he being an enemy to the Scriptures of God, and wishing to deceive men, introduces a thousand years as the term of the marriage festivity.

45. Some have in vain endeavoured to persuade us that some other book is here meant, and not the Apocalypse of John. No such work is to be traced, though we have very full accounts of Cerinthus from Irenæus and Epiphanius: and neither the plural "revelations" (which is also used by Dionysius, as cited below, of our apocalyptic visions), nor the exaggerated account of the earthly Kingdom as promised (see the same in the objections of the Alogi as cited by Dionysius above) can have the least weight in inducing us to concur in such a supposition.

46. When Lücke sets aside Caius in the same category as the Alogi, as having equally little to do with ecclesiastical tradition, we cannot help seeing again the trick of a crafty partisan wishing to get rid of an awkward ally.

47. Undoubtedly the weightiest objector to the canonicity of the Apocalypse in early times is DIONYSIUS, the successor next but one to Origen in the presidency of the catechetical school of Alexandria, and afterwards bishop of that see (A.D. 247). This worthy scholar of Origen remained ever attached to him, loving and honouring him : and wrote him a letter of consolation when he was thrown into prison in the Decian persecution. This Dionysius, as he himself tells us, had become a believer in the Gospel by a course of free investigation, and unbiassed examination of all known systems: and after his conversion, he remained true to this principle as a Christian and as a public teacher. He read and examined without bias all the writings of heretics, and did not reject them until he was thoroughly acquainted with them, and was in a situation to confute them with valid arguments. While he was thus employed, one of the presbyters of his church warned him of the harm which his own soul might take by so much contact with their impure doctrines. Of this danger, he says, he was himself too conscious: but while pondering on what had been said to him he was determined in his course by a heavenly vision: and a voice distinctly said to him, "Read every thing that comes into thy hands: for thou art well able to judge and prove them all: indeed such was at the first the source of thine own faith." And, he says, "I received the vision as agreeing with the apostolic saying, which says to the strong, 'Be prudent money-changers.'"

48. The notices left us of Dionysius in the seventh book of Eusebius, entirely correspond with the above. And the judgment which he passes on the Apocalypse is characterized by sound discretion and moderation. I give it at length in the corresponding place in the Prolegomena to my Greek Testament.

49. The general sense of it is, that, while on the one hand he separates himself from those who disparaged the book and ascribed it to Cerinthus, on the other he distinctly repudiates all literal interpretations of it as impossible, and approaches the enquiry with a strong anti-millennial bias. This more especially appears, from a previous chapter of the same book of Eusebius, in which is detailed the proceeding of Dionysius with regard to the schism of Nepos, an Egyptian bishop, of millennial views.

50. With regard to the whole character of Dionysius's criticism, we may make the following remarks :

a) its negative portion rests upon grounds common to him and ourselves, and respecting which a writer in the third century, however much we may admire his free and able treatment of his subject, has no advantage at all over one who writes in the nineteenth. It is as open to us as it was to him, to judge of the phenomena and language of the Apocalypse as compared with the Gospel and Epistles of St. John.

b) the positive result of his argument, if fairly examined, is worth absolutely nothing. The writer to whom he ascribes the book, a second John who is reputed to have lived at Ephesus, is even to himself entirely unknown: more unknown than Silvanus as a conjectural author of the Epistle to the Hebrews: more unknown than even Aquila. The very existence, in his mind, of the other John, who wrote the Apocalypse, depends on the very shadowy words, "Since they say that there were two tombs in Ephesus, and that each is said to belong to John."

51. And this latter consideration is very important. It shews us that at all events, the idea of John the Presbyter having written the Apocalypse was, in the middle of the third century, wholly unknown to ecclesiastical tradition in the church of Alexandria: or else we should never have found this seeking about and conjecturing on the matter.

52. I shall treat, further on, the question raised by this criticism of Dionysius as to the internal probability of the authorship by the Apostle John. At present I advance with notices of those who impugned or doubted it in ancient times.

53. And of those we next come to Ensebins of Cæsarea, the well-known ecclesiastical historian. His opinion on the question is wavering and undecided. Having asserted the genuineness of St. John's Gospel and First Epistle, and placed the other two Epistles among the disputed books, he proceeds, "But of the Apocalypse the character is among most men even now pulled both ways." But he professes that he will judge it by the testimonies of the ancients. Again in the next chapter, in giving a list of the universally received Scriptures, when he has mentioned the four Gospels and Acts and one Epistle of St. John and one of St. Peter, he says, "To these we may add, if it seem good, the Apocalypse of John, concerning which we will give our opinion at the proper time." And a little below, when he is speaking of the spurious books, he says, "And besides, as I said, the Apocalypse of John, if it seem good, which some, as I said, reject, and others number among the books received."

54. In adducing the well-known passage of Papias, "If any one came who had been conversant with the ancients, I enquired of him the sayings of the ancients; what Andrew or what Peter said, or what Philip or Thomas, or John, or Matthew, or any other of the disciples of the Lord, also what Aristion and John the presbyter, the disciples of the Lord, say," he says, "where it is worth while to notice that he twice enumerates the name of John, the former of which persons he ranges with Peter and James and Matthew and the rest of the Apostles, clearly meaning the Evangelist; but the other John he places with others outside the number of the Apostles, putting Aristion before him: and he plainly calls him presbyter. So that by this is shewn to be true the account of those who say that there were two of this name in Asia, and two tombs in Ephesus, and that each is to this day said to belong to John; and we are obliged to believe these persons. For it is likely that the second, unless any prefer the first, saw the Apocalypse current under the name of John."

55. The student will observe how entirely conjectural, and valueless as evidence, is this opinion of Eusebius. Certainly Lücke is wrong in his very strong denunciations of Hengstenberg for describing Eusebius as studiously leaving the question open. For what else is it, when he numbers the book on one side among the undoubted Scriptures with an "if it seem so," and then on the other among the spurious writings with an "if it seem so" also: while at the very moment of endorsing Dionysius's conjecture that the second John saw its visions, he interposes "unless any prefer the first?" That a man with the anti-millenarian leanings of Eusebius concedes thus much, makes the balance of his testimony incline rather to, than away from, the canonicity of the book. I would not press this, but simply take it as indicating that in Eusebius's time, as well as in that of Dionysius, there was no ecclesiastical tradition warranting the repudiating it as the work of the Evangelist. Adverse opinion there was, which found its fair and worthier employ in internal criticism, and issued in vague conjecture, resting on the mere fact of two persons named John having existed in Ephesus. Who and what the second John was, whether he had any right to speak of himself as the writer of the Apocalypse does, or to address with authority the seven churches of Asia,—on these and on all such questions we are wholly in the dark.

56. Cyril of Jerusalem (died 386) is a more decided witness for the exclusion of the Apocalypse from the Canon. Having prefaced the account of the twenty-two canonical books of the Old Test. with, "Do not have any thing to do with the apocryphal writings," he enumerates the canonical books of the New Test., the four Gospels, Acts, seven catholic Epistles, fourteen of St. Paul, and concludes, "But put all the rest in the second rank. And as many as are not read in the churches, neither do thou read in private, as thou heardest." And it is to be observed that he appeals for this arrangement to ancient authorities: for he says to his catechumen, in the words alluded to in the last-cited clause, "These only do thou earnestly study, which we openly read in the churches. The Apostles and the ancient bishops, who presided over the church, and handed down these books, were far wiser and more careful than thou."

57. Cyril nowhere mentions the Apocalypse by name. But he seems to use it, and even where he by inference repudiates it, to adopt its terms unconsciously. An instance of the former is found, where he says to his catechumen, speaking of his baptism, "Thou art planted in the spiritual paradise: thou receivest a new name," Rev. ii. 7, 17. Of the latter, where, professing to get his particulars respecting Antichrist from Daniel, and having said, "After them shall arise another king, who shall surpass in evil deeds all before him," he proceeds, "and he shall humble three kings, clearly from among the ten former ones, and from these ten humbling the three, he shall reign the eighth;" this last particular being from Rev. xvii. 11. And similarly in other places.

58. Thus Cyril presents to us remarkable and exceptional phenomena: familiarity with the language of the book, so as to use it unconsciously as that of prophecy, combined with a repudiation of it as canonical, and a prohibition of its study. It would appear that there had been at some time a deliberate change of opinion, and that we have, in these evident references to the Apocalypse, instances of slips of memory, and retention of phraseology which belonged to his former, not to his subsequent views.

59. In the sixtieth canon of the synod of Laodicea, held between 343 and 381, an account of the canonical books of the Old and New Testaments is given, in which the Apocalypse is omitted. The genuineness of this canon has been doubted, but apparently without reason: see Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, i. pp. 749 ff. We next come to the testimony of Gregory of Nazianzen (died 390), who, in his poem, "concerning the genuine books of the inspired Scriptures," gives the same canon as Cyril, and adds, "You have all: if any be beside these, it is not among the genuine books." But here again, as in Cyril's case, we are met by the phenomenon of reference to the book and citation of it as of theological authority. He says, speaking of the angels presiding over churches, "I think that some preside over one church, some over another, as John teaches me in the Apocalypse."

Lücke suggests in explanation of this, that possibly the churches of Asia Minor, especially that of Cappadocia, had excluded the Apocalypse from public reading in the church, on account of the countenance which it had been made to give to the errors of Montanism, and placed it among the apocryphal books. This may have been so: but I cannot think his inference secure, that therefore we may infer the general fact, that the book rested on no secure ecclesiastical tradition.

60. In a work printed as Gregory's, ascribed by some to Gregory himself, but more usually to Amphilochius of Iconium, we have the Apocalypse mentioned by name: "The Apocalypse of John again some count Scripture, but most reckon it spurious."

But it is to be noticed, that in the scholium of Andreas cited above, par. 32, he enumerates Gregory among those who recognized the canonicity of the Apocalypse.

61. After this, it will be sufficient to give a general view of the antagonism to the authority of the book. It was maintained chiefly in the Eastern church; the Western, after the fifth century, universally recognizing the Apocalypse. It is remarkable that Sulpicius Severus says the Apocalypse is "by most, either foolishly or impiously," rejected. But as Lücke observes, he must have found these "most" in the Greek, not in the Latin church. Pope Gelasius, in his decree, concerning "what books were to be received" (500), gives the book its place in the Canon of the Catholic Church, between the Epistles of St. Paul and the Catholic Epistles. Primasius and Cassiodorus, in the sixth century, expound it as apostolic and canonical. But Junilius the African, the friend of Primasius, says, that only seventeen books, viz. the Old Test. prophets and the book of Psalms, contain the Scripture prophecy: "but," he continues, "concerning the Apocalypse of John there is much doubt among the Orientals." This he had learned from Paulus, a Persian, of the school of Nisibis: and he consequently seems inclined not to place it among the "books of complete authority."

62. The fourth synod of Toledo (633) in its seventeenth canon, decrees that, seeing the Apocalypse is by many councils and Popes sanctioned as a work of the Apostle John, and as canonical, it should, under pain of excommunication, be preached on in the church between Easter and Pentecost. The Synod speaks of "many who do not receive its authority, and scorn to read it in the church of God." This, Lücke thinks, points to doubters in the West also. But Isidore of Seville (died 636), having given the generally received canon, speaks of many Latins who doubted of the Pauline origin of the Epistle to the Hebrews, of the genuineness of 2 Peter, of the Epistle of James, and 2 and 3 John; but not a word of any who doubted about the Apocalypse. So that it may be after all that the Synod of Toledo may allude to Orientals only.

63. Henceforward in the Western church, with the sole exception of the Capitulare of Charlemagne, which, following Greek authorities and especially the Synod of Laodicea, excluded the book from public reading, we find universal recognition of the Apocalypse until the Reformation.

64. In the Greek church during the last noticed period opinions were much in the same state as in the fourth century. On one side we find rejection of the book, at the least from public ecclesiastical use: on the other, unsuspecting reception of it as a genuine work of the Apostle John. Neither side takes any pains to justify its view critically, but simply conforms to local ecclesiastical usage. Cyril of Alexandria says, "The wise John, who wrote for us the book of the Apocalypse, which has also been honoured with the approval of the fathers." The very expression here, it is true, betrays consciousness of the existence of doubts, which however do not affect his confidence, nor that of his contemporaries Nilus and Isidore of Pelusium.

65. At Antioch, however, the opinion in cent. v. seems to have been different. Its greatest Father of this period, Theodore of Mopsuestia (died 429), never cites the Apocalypse in his extant writings and fragments, even where we might have certainly expected it. In the fragments of his expositions of the New Test. we have no allusion to it, even when on 2 Thess. ii. 3 ff. he speaks of Antichrist and of the second Advent: nor again in his Commentary on the twelve prophets. Opponent as he was of the allegorical method of interpretation, he may have been withheld from receiving the Apocalypse by consciousness that no other mode would suit it: or he may have followed the older practice of the Syrian church, and the canon of the Laodicean Synod. Still, he rejected the Epistle of James, which both these recognized: and Lücke thinks he may have rejected the Apocalypse from the decision of his own judgment, helped by his disinclination to the book and the existing doubt about its canonicity: being one of those who, like Luther in later times, sought and found "the Canon within the Canon."

66. Theodoret (bishop of Cyrus, died 457) alludes two or three times to the book: but on 2 Thess. ii. and on Heb. xii. 22, he leaves it unnoticed, as also in his Commentary on Daniel. On Ps. lxxxvi. 2, he seems to aim at describing the heavenly Jerusalem in contrast to the apocalyptic description. In speaking of Cerinthus, and of the Nicolaitans, the Montanists, and even of the Millenarian Nepos and his antagonist Dionysius of Alexandria, he says not a word of the Apocalypse. Only once he names it, and adduces ch. i. 9 with the formula "John says:" but then it is in citing from Athanasius.

67. After this, in the sixth century, the Syrian churches were divided on the matter. The Nestorians rejected the Apocalypse, following Theodore of Mopsuestia and the Peshito: the Monophysites received it, following the Alexandrians, and Hippolytus, and Ephrem Syrus. Lücke thinks from certain indications that even among them it was not in ecclesiastical, but only in theological use.

68. In the Greek church in Asia Minor, we have Andreas, of Caesarea in Cappadocia, the writer of the first entire and connected Commentary on the Apocalypse. He fully and earnestly recognizes its genuineness and inspiration, and (see above, par. 32) appeals to the testimony of the ancients to bear him out: mentioning by name Papias, Irenæus, Methodius, Cyril of Alexandria, and Gregory Theologus (of Nazianzum). It is perhaps hardly fair in Lücke to infer that, because he names so few, more might not have been adduced: hardly fair again to conclude that, because he promises to use their writings in his Commentary, and has not expressly cited them, he did not so use them, or was himself one of the first who explained the book.

69. Arethas, who followed Andreas in his see, and in his work of commenting on the Apocalypse, repeats in his prologue the scholium of Andreas on the Inspiration of the book, adding the authority of Basil the Great. But we are now approaching a time when, as Lücke remarks, it is really of small import who used the book and who did not, who regarded it as the work of the Apostle, and who did not. Still, a few facts stand out from the general mass, which may be useful as indications, or at all events have a claim to our attention.

70. Such is the fact of the omission of all reference to the Apocalypse in the writings of Cosmas Indicopleustes in cent. vi. In his Christian Topography, book vii., he treats of the duration of the heavens according to Scripture, and Lücke thinks must of necessity have cited the book had it been in his Canon. Still, he uses the Festal Epistle of Athanasius, in which it is expressly included in the Canon.

71. The second canon of the Trullian, or Quinisextan council, sanctions on the one hand the Canon of the Laodicean council, and that of the eighty-five apostolic canons, both which omit the Apocalypse, and on the other that of the African Synods of the end of the fourth and beginning of the fifth centuries, which include it. Various conjectures have been made as to the account to be given of this. The desire to leave the question open (Lücke) can hardly have been the cause. We may safely leave such evidence to correct itself.

72. The list may be closed with one or two notices from later centuries, shewing that the doubts were not altogether forgotten, though generally given up.

Nicephorus (beginning of cent. ix.) reckons only twenty-six books of the New Test., and does not mention the Apocalypse either in the doubtful or in the apocryphal books.

73. A prologue to the book in one of our MSS. (cent. x. or beginning of xi.), after defending its canonicity and apostolic origin, apologizes for the ancient Fathers not mentioning it among the books to be openly read in church "because they cared more about urgent spiritual matters, and judged it unprofitable for the multitude to search into such deep things."

74. In the preface to the comments of Œcumenius (cent. xi.) the canonicity of the book is strongly asserted, and its being "a genuine production of the beloved Apostle and not spurious, as some erroneously say." For this, the writer refers to Athanasius, Basil, Gregory, Methodius, Cyril, and Hippolytus.

75. In the Church History of Nicephorus Callistus (cent. xiv.), he treats it as an acknowledged fact that the Apostle John, when in exile in Patmos under Domitian, wrote his Gospel and his holy and inspired Apocalypse. Still, when enumerating the books of the canon in ii. 46, partly from Eusebius, he says summarily of the Apocalypse, that some fancied that it was the work of John the Presbyter.

76. It will be well, before passing to an account of modern opinion, to review the course and character of the evidence from antiquity. As we have before noticed, so again we may observe, that throughout, we have results here in marked contrast to those of our enquiry regarding the Epistle to the Hebrews. In that case there was a total lack of any fixed general tradition in the earliest times. Gradually, the force and convenience of an illustrious name being attached to the Epistle bore down the doubts originally resting on its authorship, and the Pauline origin became every where acquiesced in. Nothing could be more different from the history of the doubts about the authorship of the Apocalypse. Here we have a fixed and thoroughly authenticated primitive tradition. It comes from men only removed by one step from the Apostle John himself. There is absolutely no objective evidence whatever in favour of any other author. The doubts first originate in considerations purely subjective.

77. These are divisible into two classes, anti-millennial and critical. It was convenient to depreciate the book, on controversial grounds. It was found advisable not to read it in the churches, and to forbid it to the young scholar. And, as matter of fact, thus it was that the doubts about the authorship sprung up. If it countenanced error, if it was not in the canon, if it was not fit to be read, then it could not be the work of the Evangelist and Apostle.

78. Again, to the same result contributed the critical grounds so ably urged by Dionysius of Alexandria, and observed upon above, par. 50. I have there remarked, not only how absolutely shadowy and nothing-worth is Dionysius's "fancy" that John the Presbyter wrote the book, but how this very expression is most valuable, as denoting the entire absence of all objective tradition to that effect in the middle of the third century.

79. Thus the doubts grew up, and in certain parts of the church prevailed: the whole process being exactly the converse of that which we traced in our Introduction to the Hebrews.

80. And, as far as the force of ancient testimony goes, I submit that our inference also must be a contrary one. The authorship of the book by the Apostle John, as matter of primitive tradition, rests on firm and irrefragable ground. Three other authors are suggested: one, Cerinthus, by the avowed enemies of the Apocalypse, an assertion which has never found any favour: the second, John the Presbyter, whose existence seems indeed vouched for by the passage of Papias, but of whom we know nothing whatever, nor have we one particle of evidence to connect him with the authorship of the Apocalypse: and the third, John Mark the Evangelist, who is equally unknown to ancient tradition as its author.

81. As far then as purely external evidence goes, I submit that our judgment can only be in one direction: viz. that the Apocalypse was written by the Apostle John, the Son of Zebedee.

82. It will now be for us to see how far internal critical considerations substantiate or impugn the tradition of the primitive church.

83. And in so doing, it will be well for us at once to deal with certain confident assertions which Lücke and others are in the habit of making respecting the testimony of the Apocalypse itself.

84. Lücke begins this portion of his Introduction by setting aside at once the evidence of Justin Martyr and Irenæus, on the ground of supposed inconsistency with the testimony of the writer himself;—he cannot be the Apostle and Evangelist, “because he plainly distinguishes himself from the Apostles:”—referring back to a previous section for the confirmation of this assertion. On looking there, we find, “In ch. xxi. 14, in describing the heavenly Jerusalem, he speaks expressly of the twelve Apostles of Christ and their names on the twelve foundation stones of the celestial city, but apparently in such a manner as not in any way to include himself among them, but rather to exclude himself from them, and to speak of them as a higher and special class of servants and messengers of God.”

85. Now let the reader observe that the “apparently” of the former section has become “plainly” in the latter: for it is thus that even the best of the Germans are often apt to creep on, and to build up a whole fabric of argument upon an inference which at first was to themselves merely an uncertainty.

86. In this particular case, the original assertion has in fact no ground to rest upon. The apocalyptic writer is simply describing the heavenly city as it was shewn to him. On the foundations are the names of the twelve Apostles of the Lamb. Now we may fairly ask, What reason can be given why the beloved Apostle should not have related this? Was he who, with his brother James, sought for the highest place of honour in the future kingdom, likely to have depreciated the apostolic dignity just because he himself was one of the Twelve? and on the other hand, was he, whose personal modesty was as notable as his apostolic zeal, likely, in relating such high honour done to the Twelve, to insert a notice providing against the possible mistake being made of not counting himself among them?

87. So that the first tentative introduction, and the very confident after-assertion, of this testimony of the book itself, are alike groundless. A similar instance will be found below, when we come to discuss the time and place of writing, of confident assertion respecting two supposed notices of date contained in the book itself. They turn out to be altogether dependent for their relevancy on a particular method of interpretation, not borne out by fair exposition.

88. The notices contained in the Apocalypse respecting its writer may be stated as follows:

First, his name is John, ch. i. 1, 4, 9, xxii. 8.

89. Secondly, he was known to, and of account among, the churches of proconsular Asia.

90. Thirdly, he was in exile (for so we submit must the words of

ch. i. 9 be understood: see note there) in the island of Patmos on account of his Christian testimony.

We may add to these personal notices, that he takes especial pains to assert the accuracy of his testimony, both in the beginning and at the end of his book: ch. i. 2, xxii. 8.

91. Now thus far we have nothing which goes against the ecclesiastical tradition that he was the Apostle and Evangelist John. In the latter part of his life, this Apostle was thus connected with proconsular Asia, long residing, and ultimately dying at Ephesus: see Introduction to Vol. I., ch. v. § i. 9 ff. It is impossible to reject this concurrent testimony of Christian antiquity: nor have even those done so, whose doubts on the Apocalypse are the strongest.

92. Again, the exile of the Apostle John in Patmos under Domitian is matter of primitive tradition, apparently distinct from the notice contained in the Apocalypse: for his return from it under Nerva, of which no notice is contained in that book, is stated as such by Eusebius: "then" (when the Senate after Domitian's death decreed that the unjustly exiled should return to their homes) "the tradition from the ancients informs us that the Apostle John also returned from his exile in the island and dwelt at Ephesus." And again, "The Apostle whom Jesus loved, yet surviving in the parts of Asia, ruled the churches there, having returned from his exile in the island after the death of Domitian."

93. Equally definite is the tradition, that St. John lived on among the Asiatic churches till the time of Trajan: see Introduction, Vol. I., as above.

94. It is worth while just to pause by the way, and consider, in what situation we are placed by these traditions. To reject them altogether would be out of all reason: and this is not done by Lücke himself. So that we must either suppose that portion of them which regards the exile to have found its way in owing to the notice of Rev. i. 9, or to have been, independently of that notice, the result of a confusion in men's minds between two persons of the same name, John. Either of these is undoubtedly possible: but it is their probability, in the face of other evidence, which we have to estimate.

95. We may safely ask then, was either of these mistakes at all likely to have been made by Irenæus, who could write as follows: "So that I can describe the place where the blessed Polycarp sat and talked, and his goings forth and entrances, and the character of his life, and the form of his person, and the addresses which he used to make to the people, and how he related his converse with John, and that of the rest who had seen the Lord, and how he told his recollections of their sayings." I own it seems to me out of all probability that such a writer, in ascribing the Apocalypse to John the Apostle, could have confused him with another person of the same name. If we ever have trustworthy personal tradition, it is surely when it mounts up to those who saw and conversed with him respecting whom we wish to be informed.

96. It may be said indeed, that Irenæus does not mention the exile in Patmos. But this would be mere trifling: he does not, simply because he had no occasion to do so: but his own date of the seeing of the Apocalypse, at the end of the reign of Domitian (see above, par. 7), would, in combination with other notices, be sufficient to imply it: and besides, he admits it by inference from his unhesitatingly adopting the book as written by the Apostle.

97. It seems then to me that the course of primitive tradition, even among those who did not believe the Apocalypse to have been written by the Apostle, asserts of him that he was exiled in Patmos under Domitian: and that we have no reasonable ground for supposing this view to have arisen from any confusion of persons, or to have been adopted merely from the book itself. Persons are appealed to, who knew and saw and heard the Apostle himself: and those who thus appeal were not likely to have made a mistake in a point of such vital importance.

98. We now come to a weighty and difficult part of our present enquiry: how far the matter and style of the Apocalypse bear out this result of primitive tradition. The reader will have seen, by the previous chapters of this Introduction, that I am very far from deprecating, or depreciating, such a course of criticism. I do not, as some of those who have upheld against all criticism the commonly received views, characterize such an enquiry as presumptuous, or its results as uncertain and vague. It is one which the soundest and best critics of all ages have followed, from Origen and Dionysius of Alexandria down to Bleek and Lücke: and, as I have elsewhere observed, is one which will be more esteemed in proportion as biblical science is spread and deepened.

99. In applying it to the book before us, certainly the upholder of the primitive tradition of its Authorship is not encouraged by first appearances. He is met at once by the startling phenomena so ably detailed by Dionysius of Alexandria at the end of his judgment. The Greek construction of the Gospel and Epistle<sup>8</sup>, though peculiar, is smooth and unexceptionable, free from any thing like barbarism or solœcism in grammar: "not only faultless according to the Greek Language," says Dionysius, "but very skillful in its words, its reasonings, and the putting together of its meaning." When however we come to compare that of the Writer of the Apocalypse, we find, at first sight, all this reversed:

<sup>8</sup> I speak in the course of this argument of the first Epistle only, as undoubted; not that I do not believe the second and third to be genuine and characteristic also. See above, ch. xx. § i.

"I see its dialect and language not accurate Greek, but it uses barbarian idioms, and sometimes even solecisms."

100. All this must be freely acknowledged, and is abundantly exemplified in my Greek Testament Commentary. The question for us however is one which lies deeper than the surface, and beyond mere first appearances. It presents itself to us in a double form:

1) Is there any account which might be given of this great dissimilarity, consistent with identity of Authorship?

2) Are there any indications of that identity, lying beneath the surface, notwithstanding this great dissimilarity?

101. In reply to the first question, several thoughts at once suggest themselves as claiming mention and contributing to its solution. The subject of the Apocalypse is so different from those of the Gospel and Epistle, that we may well expect a not inconsiderable difference of style. In those, the Writer is, under divine guidance, calmly arranging his material, in full self-consciousness, and deliberately putting forth the product, in words, of his own reflectiveness: in this, on the other hand, he is the rapt seer, borne along from vision to vision, speaking in a region and character totally different<sup>9</sup>. Is this circumstance any contribution to our reply? Let us consider further.

102. St. John was not a Greek, but a Galilean. To speak a certain kind of Greek was probably natural to him, as to almost all the inhabitants of Palestine of his time. But to write the Greek of his Gospel and Epistle, can hardly but have been to him matter of effort. Or to put it in another point of view, the diction and form in which they were conveyed were the result of the deliberate exercise of a special gift of the Spirit, matured by practice, and deemed necessary for the purpose of those writings, to be put forth in them.

103. In the Apocalypse, the case may be conceived to have been different. The necessarily rhapsodical and mysterious character of that book may have led to the Apostle being left more to his vernacular and less correct Greek. Circumstances too may have contributed to this. The visions may have been set down in the solitude of exile, far from friends, and perhaps from the appliances of civilized life. The Hebraistic style may have come more naturally in a writing so fashioned on Old Testament models, and bound by so many links to the prophecies of Hebrew prophets. The style too of advanced age may have dropped the careful elaboration of the preceding years, and resumed the rougher character of early youth.

104. I do not say that these considerations are enough to account for the great diversity which is presented: nay, I fairly own, that taken alone, they are not: and that the difficulty has never yet been thoroughly solved. Still I do not conceive that we are at liberty to cut the knot by denying the Apostolic Authorship, which primitive tradition has so firmly established. Far better is it to investigate patiently, and not, by blind partisanship on either side, to stop the way against unfettered search for a better account of the phenomena than has hitherto been given.

105. It has been shewn more than once, and in our own country by Dr. Davidson in his Introduction, pp. 561 ff., that the roughnesses and solecisms in the Apocalypse have been, for the purposes of argument, very much exaggerated: that there are hardly any, which may not be paralleled in classical authors themselves, and that their more frequent occurrence here is no more than is due to the peculiar nature of the subject and occasion. This consideration should be borne in mind, and the matter investigated by the student for himself.

106. Our second question asked above was, whether there are any marks of identity of Authorship linking together the Gospel, Epistle, and Apocalypse, notwithstanding this great and evident dissimilarity?

107. The individual character of the Writer of the Gospel and Epistle stands forth evident and undoubted. We seem to know him in a moment. Even in the report of sayings of our Lord common to him and the other Evangelists, the peculiar tinge of expression, the choice and collocation of words, leave no doubt whose report we are reading. And so strongly does the Epistle resemble the Gospel in these particulars, that the criticism as well as the tradition of all ages has concurred in ascribing the two to the same person.

108. If now we look at the Apocalypse, we cannot for a moment feel that it is less individual, less reflecting the heart and character of its Writer. Its style, its manner of conception and arrangement of thought, its diction, are alike full of life and personal reality. So that our conditions for making this enquiry are favourable. Our two objects of comparison stand out well the one over against the other. Both are peculiar, characteristic, individual. But are the indications presented by them such that we are compelled to infer different authorship, or are they such as seem to point to one and the same person?

109. The former of these questions has been affirmed by Lücke and the opponents of the Apostolic authorship: the latter by Hengstenberg, and those who uphold it. Let us see how the matter stands. And in so doing (as was the case in the similar enquiry in the Introduction to the Epistle to the Hebrews), I shall not enter fully into the whole list of verbal and constructional peculiarities, but, referring the reader for these to Lücke and Davidson, shall adduce, and dwell upon, some of the more remarkable and suggestive of them.

110. The first of these is one undeniably connecting the Apocalypse with the Gospel and the Epistle, viz. the appellation the Word of God given to our Lord in ch. xix. 13 (see John i. 1; 1 John i. 1). This name, "the Word," for our Lord, is found in the New Test., only in the writings of St. John. I am aware of the ingenuity with which Lücke has endeavoured to turn this expression to the contrary account, maintaining that it is a proof of diversity of authorship, inasmuch as the Evangelist never writes "the Word of God:" but I may leave it to any fair-judging reader to decide, whether it be not a far greater argument for identity that the remarkable designation "the Word" is used, than for diversity that, on the solemn occasion described in the Apocalypse, the hitherto unheard adjunct "of God" is added.

111. Another reply may be given to our deduction from the use of this name: viz. that it indicates not necessarily John the Apostle, but only one familiar with his teaching, as we may suppose that other John to have been. All I can say to this is, that which I cannot help feeling to apply to the whole hypothesis of the authorship by the second John, that if it be so,—if one bearing the same name as the Apostle, having the same place among the Asiatic churches, put forth a book in which he also used the Apostle's peculiar phrases, and yet took no pains to prevent the confusion which must necessarily arise between himself and the Apostle, I do not well see how the advocates of his authorship can help pronouncing the book a forgery, or at all events the work of one who, in relating the visions, was not unwilling to be taken for his greater and Apostolic namesake.

112. Another link, binding the Apocalypse to both Gospel and Epistle, is the use of "he that overcometh," in the Epistles to the churches, ch. ii. 7, 11, 17, 26, iii. 5, 12, 21 (twice): and ch. xii. 11, xv. 2, xvii. 14, xxi. 7. Compare John xvi. 33; 1 John ii. 13, 14, iv. 4, v. 4 (twice), 5. It is amusing to observe again how dexterously Lücke turns the edge of this. "He that overcometh" is never used absolutely in Gospel or in Epistle, as it is in the Apocalypse: therefore it again is a mark of diversity, not of identity. But surely this is the very thing we might expect. The "overcoming the world," "the wicked one," "them," &c.,—these are the details, and come under notice while the strife is proceeding, or when the object is of more import than the bare act: but when the end is spoken of, and the final and general victory is all that remains in view, nothing can be more natural than that he who alone spoke of "overcoming the world," "the wicked one," "them,"—should also be the only one to designate the victor by "he that overcometh." Besides which, we have also the other use, in Rev. xii. 11.

113. A third remarkable word, true, in the sense, more or less, of genuine (aléthinos), is once used by St. Luke (Luke xvi. 11), once by St. Paul (1 Thess. i. 9), and three times in the Epistle to the Hebrews

(Heb. viii. 2, ix. 24, x. 22): but nine times in the Gospel of St. John<sup>1</sup>, four times in the Epistle<sup>2</sup>, and ten times in the Apocalypse<sup>3</sup>. Here again, it is true, Lücke adduces this on the other side, alleging that while the Evangelist uses the word only in the sense of genuine—“the true God,” “the true light,” “the true bread,”—the Author of the Apocalypse uses it of Christ as a synonym with “faithful,” “righteous,” “holy,” and as a predicate of the “words,” “judgments,” “ways” of God. This latter is true enough; but the former assertion is singularly untrue. For in four out of the nine places in the Gospel, the subjective sense of the word must be taken: viz. in iv. 27, vii. 28, viii. 16, xix. 35: and in the last of these, “his testimony is true,” the word is used exactly as in Rev. xxii. 6, “these sayings are faithful and true.”

114. The word lamb (literally, little lamb), which designates our Lord 29 times in the Apocalypse, only elsewhere occurs in John xxi. 15, not with reference to Him. But it is remarkable that John i. 29, 36 are the only places where he is called by the name of a lamb, another Greek word being used, in reference doubtless to Isa. liii. 7 (Acts viii. 32), as in one other place where He is compared to a lamb, 1 Pet. i. 19. The Apocalyptic writer, as Lücke observes, probably chooses the diminutive, and attaches to it the epithet “slain,” for the purpose of contrast to the majesty and power which he has also to predicate of Christ: but is it not to be taken into account, that this personal name, the Lamb, whether in one form or the other, whether with or without the adjunct “of God,” is common only to the two books?

115. To these many minor examples might be added, and will be found treated at length in Lücke, p. 669 ff., Davidson, p. 561 ff.<sup>4</sup>. The latter writer has succeeded in many cases in shewing the unfairness of Lücke’s strong partisanship, by which he makes every similarity into a dissimilarity: but on the other hand he on his side has gone perhaps too far in attempting to answer every objection of this kind. After all, while there certainly are weighty indications of identity of authorship, there is also a residuum of phenomena of diversity quite enough for the reasonable support of the contrary hypothesis. If the book stood alone in the

<sup>4</sup> I have observed the following which I have not seen elsewhere noticed, occurring only in the three books, or only in the peculiar sense:—

1. “Ye cannot bear them yet,” John xvi. 12.

“Thou canst not bear wicked men,” Rev. ii. 2.

2. “Weary from his journey,” John iv. 6.

“Thou hast not (literally) grown weary,” Rev. ii. 3.

3. “Two angels in white,” John xx. 12.

“They shall walk with me in white,” Rev. iii. 4.

4. Compare Rev. iii. 18 with 1 John ii. 20, 27, as to the anointing and its effects.

matter of evidence, I own I should be quite at a loss how to substantiate identity of authorship between it and the Gospel and Epistle. But as it is, our main reliance is on the concurrent testimony of primitive tradition, which hardly can be stronger than it is, and which the perfectly gratuitous hypothesis respecting a second John as the author entirely fails to shake.

116. Our question respecting the internal evidence furnished by the book itself is thus in a position entirely different from that which it occupied in the Introduction to the Epistle to the Hebrews. There, we had no primitive tradition so general, or of such authority as to command our assent. The question was perfectly open. The authorship by St. Paul was an opinion at first tentatively and partially held: then as time wore on, acquiring consistency and acceptance. Judging of this by the book itself, is it for us to accept or to reject it? In lack of any worthy external evidence, we were thrown back on this as our main material for a judgment.

117. But with regard to the Apocalypse, external and internal evidence have changed places. The former is now the main material for our judgment. It is of the highest and most satisfactory kind. It was unanimous in very early times. It came from those who knew and had heard St. John himself. It only begins to be impugned by those who had doctrinal objections to the book. The doubt was taken up by more reasonable men on internal and critical grounds. But no real substantive counter-claimant was ever produced: only one whose very existence depended on the report of two tombs bearing the name of John, and on a not very perspicuous passage of Papias.

118. This being so, our enquiry necessarily has taken this shape:—Is the book itself inconsistent with this apparently irrefragable testimony? And in replying to it, we have confessed that the differences between it and the Gospel and Epistle are very remarkable, and of a character hitherto unexplained, or not fully accounted for: but that there are at the same time striking notes of similarity in expression and cast of thought: and that perhaps we are not in a position to take into account the effect of a totally different subject and totally different circumstances upon one, who though knowing and speaking Greek, was yet a Hebrew by birth.

119. Thus, all things considered, being it is true far from satisfied with any account at present given of the peculiar style and phænomena of the Apocalypse, but being far less satisfied with the procedure of the antagonists of the Apostolic authorship, we are not prepared to withhold our assent from the firm and unshaken testimony of primitive tradition, that the author was the Apostle and Evangelist St. John.

SECTION II.

PLACE AND TIME OF WRITING.

1. The enquiry as to the former of these is narrowed within a very small space. From the notice contained in the book itself (ch. i. 9) the writing must have taken place either in Patmos, or after the return from exile. The past tenses, "bore witness" in ch. i. 2, and "I was" in i. 9, do not decide for the latter alternative; they may both be used as from the point of time when the book should be read, as is common in all narratives. On the other hand, it would be more probable, judging from without, that the writing should take place after the return, especially if we are to credit the account given by Victorinus, that St. John was condemned to the mines in Patmos. We have no means of determining the question, and must leave it in doubt. If the style and peculiarities are to be in any degree attributed to outward circumstances, then it would seem to have been written in solitude, and sent from Patmos to the Asiatic churches.

2. The only traditional notice worth recounting is that given by Victorinus (cent. iv.): on Rev. x. 11: where he relates that John saw the Apocalypse in Patmos, and then after his release on the death of Domitian, "afterwards delivered down the same Apocalypse which he had received from the Lord." Arethas indeed (cent. x.) says on Rev. vii., "The Evangelist prophesied this in Ionia which is by Ephesus:" but this is too late to be of any account in the matter.

3. It has been remarked<sup>5</sup>, that the circumstance of John having prepared to write down the voices of the seven thunders, Rev. x. 4, appears to sanction the view that the writing took place at the same time with the seeing of the visions.

4. As regards Patmos itself, it is one of the group called the Sporades, to the S. of Samos. It is about thirty Roman miles in circumference. A cave is still shewn in the island (now Patmo) where St. John is said to have seen the Apocalypse. See the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography.

5. With regard however to the time of writing, there has been no small controversy. And at this we need not be surprised, seeing that principles of interpretation are involved.

We will first deal with ancient tradition, as far as it gives us any indication as to the date.

6. Irenæus, in a passage already cited (§ i. par. 7), tells us that the Apocalypse "was seen close upon our own generation, at the end of the reign of Domitian."

7. Clement of Alexandria says, "When, at the death of the tyrant, he removed from the island Patmos to Ephesus, &c." This passage, it is true, contains no mention who the tyrant was, nor any allusion to the writing of the Apocalypse: but it is interesting for our present enquiry as shewing, in its citation by Eusebius, how he understood the date furnished by it. For he introduces it by saying that St. John "ruled the churches in Asia when he had returned from his exile in the island after the death of Domitian," and cites Clement as one of the witnesses of the fact.

8. Origen merely calls St. John's persecutor "the king of the Romans," without specifying which. And he seems to do this wittingly: for he notices that John himself does not mention who condemned him. See the passage quoted above, § i. par. 12.

9. Eusebius, having cited the passage of Irenæus noticed above, says, "Some have even accurately specified the time as the fifteenth year of Domitian, mentioning, with many others, Flavia Domitilla, daughter of the sister of Flavius Clemens, one of the powerful men at Rome at that time, as having been banished to the island Pontia for her testimony to Christ." And this same statement he repeats elsewhere: and, in another place, gives the account of the return of St. John from Patmos in the beginning of Nerva's reign, cited above, par. 92.

10. Tertullian does not appear quite to bear out Eusebius's understanding of him: for he only says, after mentioning the persecution of Nero, "Domitian also had attempted it, being a partial inheritor of Nero's cruelty: but being also accessible to humane feeling, he easily stopped it when begun, and even restored those whom he had banished." Here he certainly makes Domitian himself recall the exiles.

11. Victorinus, in the passage above referred to (par. 1), and afterwards (par. 2), plainly gives the date: as also in another place, where he states that the Apocalypse was written under Domitian.

12. Jerome says, "Domitian in his fourteenth year beginning the persecution second after Nero, he (John) being banished to the island Patmos wrote the Apocalypse . . . but when Domitian was slain, and his acts, on account of their excessive cruelty, repealed by the Senate, he returned to Ephesus under the Emperor Nerva." See too his testimony above, § i. par. 25.

13. So also Sulpicius Severus and Orosius, and later writers generally. The first who breaks in upon this concurrent tradition is Epiphanius, in two very curious passages: the first where he says, "that the Holy Spirit moved John to write his Gospel, at the age of ninety, after his return from Patmos, which took place under Claudius Cæsar;" the other,—that "he prophesied long ago, in the times of Claudius Cæsar, when he was in the island Patmos."

14. Now it is plain that there must be some strange blunder here, which Lücke, who makes much of Epiphanius's testimony as shewing that the tradition, which he calls the Irenæan, was not received by Epiphanius, entirely, and conveniently, omits to notice. The passage evidently sets the return from exile in the extreme old age of St. John. Now if this is so, seeing that Claudius reigned from 41 to 54 A.D., putting the return from exile at the last of these dates, we should have St. John aged ninety in the year 54: in other words, thirty-three years older than our Lord, and sixty-three at least when called to be an Apostle: a result which is at variance with all ancient tradition whatever. Either Epiphanius has fallen into some great mistake, which is not very probable, or he means by Claudius some other Emperor: if Nero, then he would still be wrong as to St. John's age at or near to his return.

15. The testimony of Muratori's fragment on the Canon has been cited (by Stuart, p. 218) as testifying to an early date. But all it says is this: "The blessed Apostle Paul himself, following the order of his predecessor John, writes by name to seven churches in the same order." And the word predecessor, as has been pointed out by Credner, merely seems to mean that St. John was an apostle before St. Paul (or perhaps only represents the title presbyter or elder), not to imply that he wrote his seven epistles before St. Paul wrote his.

16. The preface to the Syriac version of the Apocalypse published by De Dieu, supposed to have been made in the 6th century, says that the visions were seen by St. John in the island of Patmos, to which he had been banished by the Emperor Nero.

17. Theophylact, in his preface to the Gospel of St. John, says that it was written thirty-two years after the Ascension in the island of Patmos: and in so saying, places the exile under Nero. But he clearly is wrong, as Lücke remarks, or his meaning not clearly understood, when he attributes the writing of the Gospel to this time: and moreover he is inconsistent with himself: for in commenting on Matt. xx. 22, he remarks that as Herod put to death the Apostle James the greater, so Trajan condemned John as a martyr to the word of truth.

18. Jerome determines nothing, only citing Tertullian: "Tertullian relates that having been put by Nero into a cask of burning oil, he came out clearer and healthier than he went in." But Tertullian only says, in the place apparently referred to, "Happy is the (Roman) Church . . . where Peter was equalled to the passion of our Lord, where Paul was crowned with the death of John (i. e. the Baptist), where the Apostle John having been immersed in burning oil and taken no hurt, was banished to an island." It surely is stretching a point here to say that he implies all three events to have taken place under Nero.

19. The Author of the "Synopsis of the Life and Death of the Prophets, Apostles, and Disciples of the Lord" (ostensibly Dorotheus, bishop of Tyre: but probably it belongs to the 6th century), makes John to be exiled to Patmos by Trajan. Andreas and Arethas give no decided testimony on the point. Arethas, in commenting on Rev. vi. 12, says, that some applied this prophecy to the destruction of Jerusalem under Vespasian: but this is distinctly repudiated by Andreas: allowing however (on vii. 2) that such things did happen to the Jewish Christians who escaped the evils inflicted on Jerusalem by the Romans, yet they more probably refer to the times of Antichrist. Arethas again, on Rev. i. 9 cites without any protest Eusebius, as asserting St. John's exile in Patmos to have taken place under Domitian.

20. Much more evidence on this subject from other later writers whose testimonies are of less consequence,—and more minute discussion of the earlier testimonies, will be found in Elliott, Horæ Apocalyptice, i. pp. 31—46, and Appendix, No. i. pp. 503—517. In the last mentioned, he has gone well and carefully through the arguments on external evidence adduced by Lücke and Stuart for the writing under Galba and Nero respectively, and, as it seems to me, disposed of them all.

21. Our result, as far as this part of the question is considered, may be thus stated. We have a constant and unswerving primitive tradition that St. John's exile took place, and the Apocalypse was written, towards the end of Domitian's reign. With this tradition, as has been often observed, the circumstances seem to agree very well. We have no evidence that the first, or Neronian, persecution, extended beyond Rome, or found vent in condemnations to exile. Whereas in regard to the second we know that both these were the case. Indeed the liberation at Domitian's death of those whom he had exiled is substantiated by Dio Cassius, who, in relating the beginning of Nerva's reign, says, "Through hatred of Domitian his statues . . . were thrown down . . . and Nerva pardoned those who were condemned for impiety, and recalled the exiles . . . and made a general concession that neither impiety, nor Jewish way of living, should form matter of accusation against any."

22. Assuming then the fact of St. John's exile at Patmos during a persecution for the Gospel's sake, it is far more likely that it should have been under Domitian than under Nero or under Galba. But one main reliance of the advocates of the earlier date is internal evidence supposed to be furnished by the book itself. And this, first, from the rough and Hebraistic style. I have already discussed this point, and have fully admitted its difficulty, however we view it. I need only add now, that I do not conceive we at all diminish that difficulty by supposing it to be written before the Gospel and Epistle. The Greek of the Gospel and Epistle is not the Greek of the Apocalypse in a maturer state : but if the two belong to one and the same writer, we must seek for the cause of their diversity not in chronological but rather in psychological considerations.

23. Again, it is said that the book furnishes indications of having been written before the destruction of Jerusalem, by the fact of its mentioning the city and the temple, ch. xi. 1 ff., and the twelve tribes as yet existing, ch. vii. 4—8. This argument has been very much insisted on by several of the modern German critics. But we may demur to it at once, as containing an assumption which we are not prepared to grant : viz. that the prophetic passage is to be thus interpreted, or has any thing to do with the literal Jerusalem. Let the canon of interpretation be first substantiated, by which we are to be bound in our understanding of this passage, and then we can recognize its bearing on the chronological question. Certainly Lücke has not done this, but, as usual with him, has fallen to abusing Hengstenberg, for which he undoubtedly has a strong case, while for his own interpretation he seems to me to make out a very weak one.

24. Another such assumption is found in the confident assertion by the same critics, that the passages in ch. xiii. 1 ff., xvii. 10 point out the then reigning Cæsar, and that by the conditions of those passages, such reigning Cæsar must be that one who suits their chronological theory. It is not the place here to discuss principles of interpretation : but we may fairly demur again to the thus assuming a principle irrespective of the requirements of the book, and then judging the book itself by it. This is manifestly done by Lücke. Besides which, the differences among themselves of those who adopt this view are such as to deprive it of all fixity as an historical indication. Are we to reckon our Cæsars forwards (and if so, are we to begin with Julius, or with Augustus ?), or backwards, upon some independent assumption of the time of writing, which the other phænomena must be made to fit ? If the reader will consult the notes on ch. xvii. 10, I trust he will see that any such view of the passages is untenable.

25. Upon interpretations like these, insulated, and derived from mere first impressions of the wording of single passages, is the whole fabric built, which is to supersede the primitive tradition as to the date of the Apocalypse. On this account, Irenæus, who had such good and sufficient means of knowing, must be supposed to have made a mistake in the date which he assigns : on this account, all those additional testimonies which in any other case would have been adduced as independent and important, are to be assumed to have been mere repetitions of that of Irenæus.

26. But it is most unfortunate for these critics that, when once so sure a ground is established for them as a direct indication, in the book itself, of the emperor under whom it was written, they cannot agree among themselves who this emperor was. Some among them (e. g. Stuart, and others) taking the natural (and one would think the only possible) view of such an historical indication, begin according to general custom with Julius, and bring the writing under Nero. Ewald and Lücke, on account of the "is not, and shall come" of ch. xvii. 8, which they wish to apply to Nero, desert the usual reckoning of Roman emperors, and begin with Augustus, thus bringing the writing under Galba. Again, Eichhorn and Bleek, wishing to bring the writing under Vespasian, omit Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, relying on an expression of Suetonius, that their reigns were a mere "rebellion of three princes." Thus by changing the usual starting-point, and leaving out of the usual list of the Cæsars any number found convenient, any view we please may be substantiated by this kind of interpretation. Those whose view of the prophecy extends wider, and who attach a larger meaning to the symbols of the beast and his image and his heads, will not be induced by such very uncertain speculations to set aside a primitive and as it appears to them thoroughly trustworthy tradition.

27. It may be observed that Lücke attempts to give an account of the origin of what he calls the Irenæan tradition, freely confessing that his proof (?) of the date is not complete without such an account. The character of the account he gives is well worth observing. When, he says, men found that the apocalyptic prophecies had failed of their accomplishment, they began to give a wider sense to them, and to put them at a later date. And having given this account, he attempts to vindicate it from the charge of overthrowing the authority of Scripture prophecy, and says that though it may not be as convenient as the way which modern orthodoxy has struck out, yet it leads more safely to the desired end, and to the permanent enjoyment of true faith.

28. With every disposition to search and prove all things, and ground faith upon things thus proved, I own I am quite unable to come to Lücke's conclusions, or to those of any of the maintainers of the Neronic or any of the earlier dates. The book itself, it seems to me, refuses the assignment of such times of writing. The evident assumption which it makes of long-standing and general persecution (ch. vi. 9) forbids us to place it in the very first persecution, and that only a partial one: the undoubted transference of Jewish temple emblems to a Christian sense (ch. i. 20) of itself makes us suspect those interpreters who maintain the literal sense when the temple and city are mentioned: the analogy of the prophecies of Daniel forbids us to limit to individual kings the interpretation of the symbolic heads of the beast: the whole character and tone of the writing precludes our imagining that its original reference was ever intended to be to mere local matters of secondary import.

29. The state of those to whom it was addressed furnishes another powerful subsidiary argument in favour of the later date. This will be expanded in the next section.

30. These things then being considered,—the decisive testimony of primitive tradition, and failure of all attempts to set it aside,—the internal evidence furnished by the book itself, and equal failure of all attempts by an unwarrantable interpretation to raise up counter evidence,—I have no hesitation in believing, with the ancient fathers and most competent witnesses, that the Apocalypse was written at the end of the reign of Domitian, i. e. about the year 95 or 96 A.D.

SECTION III.

TO WHOM ADDRESSED.

1. The superscription of the book plainly states for what readers it was primarily intended. At the same time indications abound, that the whole Christian church was in view. In the very epistles to the seven churches themselves, all the promises and sayings of the Lord, though arising out of local circumstances, are of perfectly general application. And in the course of the prophecy, the wide range of objects embraced, the universality of the cautions and encouragements, the vast periods of time comprised, leave us no inference but this, that the book was intended for the comfort and profit of every age of the Christian Church. In treating therefore the question at the head of this section in its narrower and literal sense, I am not excluding the broader and general view. It lies behind the other, as in the rest of the apostolic writings. “These things,” as the older Scriptures, “are written for our ensamples, upon whom the ends of the world are come:” or, in the language of the Muratori fragment on the Canon, “John, though he writes to seven churches, yet speaks to all.”

2. The book then was directly addressed to the seven churches of proconsular Asia. A few remarks must be made on the general subject of the names and state of these churches, before entering on a description of them severally.

3. First, as to the selection of the names. The number seven, so often used by the Seer to express universality, has here prevailed in occasioning that number of names to be selected out of the churches in the district. For these were not all the churches comprised in Asia proper. Whether there were Christian bodies in Colossæ and Hierapolis, we cannot say. Those cities had been, since the writing of St. Paul’s Epistle, destroyed by an earthquake, and in what state of restoration they were at this date is uncertain. But from the Epistles of Ignatius we may fairly assume that there were churches in Magnesia and Tralles. The number seven then is representative, not exhaustive. These seven are taken in the following order: Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, Laodicea. That is, beginning with Ephesus, the first city in the province (see note, Acts ii. 9), it follows a line from South to North up to Pergamum, then takes the neighbouring city of Thyatira, and follows another line from North to South.

4. As regards the general state of these churches, we may make the following remarks:

We have from St. Paul, setting aside the Epistle to the Ephesians, not from any doubt as to its original destination, but as containing no local notices, and that to Philemon, as being of a private character,—three Epistles containing notices of the Christian churches within this district. The first in point of time is that to the Colossians (A.D. 61—63): then follow the two to Timothy, dating from 67 to 68. It is important to observe, that all these Epistles, even the latest of them, the second to Timothy, have regard to a state of the churches evidently preceding by many years that set before us in this book. The germs of heresy and error there apparent (see Introduction to the Pastoral Epistles, § i. par. 12 ff.) had expanded into definite sects (ch. ii. 6, 15): the first ardour with which some of them had received and practised the Gospel, had cooled (ch. ii. 4, 5, iii. 2): others had increased in zeal for God, and were surpassing their former works (ch. ii. 19). Again, the days of the martyrdom of Antipas, an eminent servant of Christ, are referred back to as some time past (ch. ii. 13).

5. It is also important to notice that Laodicea is described (ch. iii. 17) as boasting in her wealth and self-sufficiency. Now we know from Tacitus (see below, § iv. par. 12), that in the sixth year of Nero, or in the tenth, according to Eusebius (and apparently with more accuracy), Laodicea was destroyed by an earthquake, and recovered herself by her own resources, without any assistance from the Head of the state. How many years it might take before the city could again put on such a spirit of self-sufficing pride as that shewn in ch. iii. 17, it is not possible to fix exactly: but it is obvious that we must allow more time for this than would be consistent with the Neronian date of the Apocalypse. This is confirmed when we observe the spiritual character given of the Laodicean church,—that of lukewarmness,—and reflect, that such a character does not ordinarily accompany, nor follow close upon, great judgments and afflictions, but is the result of a period of calm and prosperity, and gradually encroaching compromise with ungodliness.

6. I may further mention, that the fact of the relation here shewn to exist between John and the churches of proconsular Asia, points to a period wholly distinct from that in which Paul, or his disciple Timothy, exercised authority in those parts. And this alone would lead us to meet with a decided negative the hypothesis of the Apocalypse being written under Nero, Galba, or even Vespasian. At the same time, see note on ch. ii. 20,—the mention of eating things sacrificed to idols there identifies the temptations and difficulties which beset the churches when the Apocalypse was written, with those which we know to have been prevalent in the apostolic age, and thus gives a strong confirmation of the authenticity of the book.

I now proceed to consider these churches one by one.

7. EPHESUS, the capital of proconsular Asia, has already been described, and a sketch of its history given, in the Introduction to the Epistle to the Ephesians, § ii. parr. 1—6. More detailed accounts are there referred to. The notes to the Epistle will in each case put the student in possession of the general character and particular excellencies or failings of each church, so that I need not repeat them here. In reference to the threat uttered by our Lord in ch. ii. 5, we may remark, that a few miserable huts, and ruins of great extent and massiveness, are all that now remains of the former splendid capital of Asia. The candlestick has indeed been removed from its place, and the church has become extinct. We may notice, that Ephesus naturally leads the seven, both as the metropolis of the province, and as containing that church, with which the Writer himself was individually connected.

8. SMYRNA, a famous commercial city of Ionia, at the head of the bay named after it, and at the mouth of the small river Meles: from which Homer, whose birthplace Smyrna, among other cities, claimed to be, is sometimes called Melesigenes. It is 320 stadia (40 miles) north of Ephesus. It was a very ancient city: but lay in ruins, after its destruction by the Lydians (B.C. 627), for 400 years (till Alexander the Great, according to Pliny and Pausanias; till Antigonos, according to Strabo). It was then rebuilt, 20 stadia from old Smyrna, and rose to be, in the time of the first Cæsars, one of the fairest and most populous cities in Asia. Modern Smyrna is a large city of more than 120,000 inhabitants, the centre of the trade of the Levant. The church in Smyrna was distinguished for its illustrious first bishop the martyr Polycarp, who is said by Irenæus to have been put to death in the stadium there in A.D. 166.

9. PERGAMUM (sometimes Pergamus), an ancient city of Mysia, on the river Cæicus, an “illustrious city” (Strabo). At first it appears to have been a mere hill-fortress of great natural strength; but it became an important city owing to the circumstance of Lysimachus, one of Alexander’s generals, having chosen it for the reception of his treasures, and entrusted them to his eunuch Philæterus, who rebelled against him (B.C. 283), and founded a kingdom, which lasted 150 years, when it was bequeathed by its last sovereign Attalus III. (B.C. 133) to the Roman people. Pergamum possessed a magnificent library, founded by its sovereign Eumenes (B.C. 197—159), which subsequently was given by Antony to Cleopatra, and perished with that at Alexandria under Caliph Omar. It became the official capital of the Roman province of Asia. There was there a celebrated temple of Æsculapius, on which see note, ch. ii. 13. There is still a considerable city, containing, it is said (Stuart, p. 450), about 3000 nominal Christians. It is now called Bergamah.

10. THYATIRA, once called Pelopia and Euippia, a town in Lydia, about a day's journey south of Pergamum. It was perhaps originally a Macedonian colony. Its chief trade was dyeing of purple, cf. Acts xvi. 14 and note. It is said to be at present a considerable town with many ruins, called Ak-Hisar, and to contain some 3000 Christians.

11. SARDIS, the ancient capital of the kingdom of Lydia, lay in a plain between the mountains Tmolus and Hermus, on the small river Pactolus: 33 miles from Thyatira and 28 from Philadelphia by the Antonine Itinerary. Its classical history is well known. In the reign of Tiberius it was destroyed by an earthquake, but restored by order of that emperor. It was the capital of a "conventus" in the time of Pliny; and continued a wealthy city to the end of the Byzantine empire. More than one Christian council was held here. In the eleventh century Sardis fell into the hands of the Turks, and in the thirteenth it was destroyed by Tamerlane. Only a village (Sart) now remains, built among the ruins of the ancient city.

12. PHILADELPHIA, in Lydia, on the N.W. side of Mount Tmolus, 28 miles S.E. from Sardis. It was built by Attalus Philadelphus, King of Pergamum. Earthquakes were exceedingly prevalent in the district, and it was more than once nearly demolished by them. It defended itself against the Turks for some time, but was eventually taken by Bajazet in 1390. It is now a considerable town named Allahshar, containing ruins of its ancient wall, and of about twenty-four churches.

13. LAODICEA, "Laodiceia ad Lyeum," was a celebrated city in the S.W. of Phrygia, near the river Lyeus. It was originally called Diospolis, and afterwards Rhœas: and the name Laodicea was owing to its being rebuilt by Antiochus Theos in honour of his wife Laodice. It was not far from Colossæ, and only six miles W. of Hierapolis. It suffered much in the Mithridatic war: but recovered itself, and became a wealthy and important place, at the end of the republic and under the first emperors. It was completely destroyed by the great earthquake in the year 62 A.D.: but was rebuilt by the wealth of its own citizens, without help from the state. Its state of prosperity and carelessness in spiritual things described in the Epistle is well illustrated by these facts. St. Paul wrote an Epistle to the Laodiceans, now lost. See Col. iv. 16, and this Introduction, ch. xiv. § iii. 2, 3. It produced literary men of eminence, and had a great medical school. It was the capital of a "conventus" during the Roman empire. It was utterly ravaged by the Turks, and "nothing," says Hamilton, "can exceed the desolation and melancholy appearance of the site of Laodicea." A village exists among the ruins, named Eski-hissar.

14. See for further notices on the Seven Churches, Dr. Smith's Dictionary of Geography, from which, among other sources, the above accounts are compiled. In those works will be found detailed references to the works of various travellers who have visited them.

SECTION IV.

OBJECT AND CONTENTS.

1. The Apocalypse declares its own object (ch. i. 1) to be mainly prophetic; the exhibition to God's servants of things which must shortly come to pass. And to this by far the larger portion of the book is devoted. From ch. iv. 1 to xxii. 5, is a series of visions prophetic of things to come, or introducing in their completeness allégories which involve things to come. Intermixed however with this prophetic development, we have a course of hortatory and encouraging sayings, arising out of the state of the churches to which the book is written, and addressed through them to the church universal.

2. These sayings are mostly related in style and sense to the Epistles with which the book began, so as to preserve in a remarkable manner the unity of the whole, and to shew that it is not, as Grotius and some others have supposed, a congeries of different fragments, but one united work, written at one and the same time. The practical tendency of the Epistles to the Churches is never lost sight of throughout. So that we may fairly say that its object is not only to prophesy of the future, but also by such prophecy to rebuke, exhort, and console the Church.

3. Such being the general object, our enquiry is now narrowed to that of the prophetic portion itself: and we have to enquire what was the aim of the Writer, or rather of Him who inspired the Writer, in delivering this prophecy.

4. And in the first place, we are met by an enquiry which it may be strange enough that we have to make in this day, but which nevertheless must be made. Is the book, it is asked, strictly speaking, a revelation at all? Is its so-called prophecy any thing more than the ardent and imaginative poesy of a rapt spirit, built up on the then present trials and hopes of himself and his contemporaries? Is not its future bounded by the age and circumstances then existing? And are not all those mistaken, who have attempted to deduce from it indications respecting our own or any subsequent age of the Church?

5. Two systems of understanding and interpreting the book have been raised on the basis of a view represented by the foregoing questions. The former of them, that of Grotius, Ewald, Eichhorn, and others, proceeds consistently enough in denying all prophecy, and explaining figuratively, with regard to then present expectations, right or wrong, all the things contained in the book. The latter, that of Lücke, De Wette, Bleek, Diisterdieck, and others, while it professes to recognize a certain kind of inspiration in the Writer, yet believes his view to have been entirely bounded by his own subjectivity and circumstances, denying that the book contains any thing specially revealed to John and by him declared to us; and regarding its whole contents as only instructive, in so far as they represent to us the aspirations of a fervid and inspired man, full of the Spirit of God, and his insight into forms of conflict and evil which are ever recurring in the history of the world and the Church.

6. I own it seems to me that we cannot in consistency or in honesty accept this compromise. For let us ask ourselves, how does it agree with the phenomena? It conveniently saves the credit of the Writer, and rescues the book from being an imposture, by conceding that he saw all which he says he saw: but at the same time maintains, that all which he saw was purely subjective, having no external objective existence: and that those things which seem to be prophecies of the distant future, are in fact no such prophecies, but have and exhaust their significance within the horizon of the writer's own experience and hopes.

7. But then, if this be so, I do not see, after all, how the credit of the Writer is so entirely saved. He distinctly lays claim to be speaking of long periods of time. To say nothing of the time involved in the other visions, he speaks of a thousand years, and of things which must happen at the end of that period. So that we must say, on the theory in question, that all his declarations of this kind are pure mistakes: and, in exegesis, our view must be entirely limited to the enquiry, not what is for us and for all the meaning of this or that prophecy, but what was the Writer's meaning when he set it down. Whether subsequent events justified his guess, or falsified it, is for us a pure matter of archaeological and psychological interest, and no more.

8. If this be so, I submit that the book at once becomes that which is known as apocryphal, as distinguished from canonical: it is of no more value to us than the Shepherd of Hermas, or the Ascension of Isaiah: and is mere matter for criticism and independent judgment.

9. It will be no surprise to the readers of this work to be told, that we are not prepared thus to deal with a book which we accept as canonical, and have all reason to believe to have been written by an Apostle. While we are no believers in what has been (we cannot help thinking foolishly) called verbal inspiration, we are not prepared to set aside the whole substance of the testimony of the writer of a book which we accept as canonical, nor to deny that visions, which he purports to have received from God to shew to the church things which must shortly come to pass, were so received by him, and for such a purpose.

10. Maintaining this ground, and taking into account the tone of the book itself, and the periods embraced in its prophecies, we cannot consent to believe the vision of the Writer to have been bounded by the horizon of his own experience and personal hopes. We receive the book as being what it professes to be, a revelation from God, designed to shew to his servants things which must shortly come to pass<sup>6</sup>. And so far from this word offending us, we find in it, as compared with the contents of the book, a measure by which, not our judgment of those contents, but our estimate of worldly events and their duration, should be corrected. The space denoted by shortly confessedly contains, among other periods, a period of a thousand years. On what principle are we to affirm that it does not embrace a period vastly greater than this in its whole contents?

11. We hold therefore that the book, judged by its own testimony, and with regard to the place which it holds among the canonical books of Scripture, is written with the object of conveying to the Church revelations from God respecting certain portions of her course even up to the time of the end. Whether such revelations disclose to her a continuous prophetic history, or are to be taken as presenting varying views and relations of her conflict with evil, and God's judgment on her enemies, will be hereafter discussed. But the general object is independent of these differences in interpretation.

12. The contents of the book have been variously arranged. It seems better to follow the plain indication of the book itself, than to distribute it so as to suit any theory of interpretation. We find in so doing, that we have,

I. A general introduction to the whole book, ch. i. 1—3:

- II. The portion containing the Epistles to the seven churches,
     i. 4—iii. 22, itself consisting of a. The address and preface, i. 4—8.
     b. The introductory vision, i. 9—20.
     c. The seven Epistles, ii. 1—iii. 22.

<sup>6</sup> Dürstendiek has stigmatized this view as that of magical inspiration, as distinguished from his own, which he designates as that of ethical inspiration. It is difficult to assign any meaning to these epithets at all corresponding to the nature of the case. Why that inspiration should be called magical, which makes the prophet the organ of communicating the divine counsels in symbolical language to the Church, it is difficult to say: and surely not less difficult to explain, how that inspiration can be called ethical, which makes him pretend to have received visions from God, which he has only imagined in his own mind.

III. The prophetic portion, iv. 1—xxii. 5; and herein

- a. The heavenly scene of vision, iv. 1—11.
- b. 1. The sealed book, and the Lamb who should open its seven seals, v. 1—14.
2. the seven seals opened, vi. 1—viii. 5, wherein are inserted two episodes, between the sixth and seventh seals.
  - a. the sealing of the elect, vii. 1—8.
  - b. the multitude of the redeemed, vii. 9—17.
- c. The seven trumpets of vengeance, introduced indeed before the conclusion of the former portion, viii. 2, but properly extending from viii. 6—xi. 19.
But here again we have two episodes, between the sixth and seventh trumpets,
  - a. the little book, x. 1—11.
  - b. the two witnesses, xi. 1—14.
- d. The woman and her three enemies, xii. 1—xiii. 18. And herein
  - a. the dragon, xii. 1—17.
  - b. the beast, xii. 18—xiii. 10.
  - c. the second beast, or false prophet, xiii. 11—18.
- e. The introduction to the final triumph and the final vengeance, xiv. 1—20. And herein
  - a. the Lamb and his elect, xiv. 1—5.
  - b. the three angels announcing the heads of the coming prophecy:
    1. the warning of judgments, xiv. 6, 7.
    2. the fall of Babylon, xiv. 8.
    3. the punishment of the unfaithful, xiv. 9—12.
    4. A voice proclaiming the blessedness of the holy dead, xiv. 13.
  - c. the harvest (xiv. 14—16) and the vintage (xiv. 17—20) of the earth.
- f. The pouring out of the seven last vials of wrath, xv. 1—xvi. 21.
- g. The judgment of Babylon, xvii. 1—xviii. 24.
- h. The final triumph, xix. 1—xxii. 5. And herein
  - a. the church's song of praise, xix. 1—10.
  - b. the issuing forth of the Lord and His hosts to victory, xix. 11—16.
  - c. the destruction of the beast and false prophet and kings of the earth, xix. 17—21.
  - d. the binding of the dragon, and the millennial reign, xx. 1—6.
  - e. the unbinding, and final overthrow, of Satan, xx. 7—10.
  - f. the general judgment, xx. 11—15.

g. the new heavens and earth, and glories of the heavenly Jerusalem, xxi. 1—xxii. 5.

IV. The conclusion, xxii. 6—21. See on all this the table at p. 363, in which the contents are arranged with a view to prophetic interpretation.

SECTION V.

SYSTEMS OF INTERPRETATION.

1. It would be as much beyond the limits as it is beside the purpose of this Introduction, to give a detailed history of apocalyptic interpretation. And it would be, after all, spending much labour over that which has been well and sufficiently done already. For English readers, the large portion of Mr. Elliott's fourth volume of his Horæ Apocalypticæ which is devoted to the subject contains an ample account of apocalyptic expositors from the first times to the present: and for those who can read German, Lücke's Einleitung will furnish more critical though shorter notices of many among them<sup>7</sup>. To these works, and to others like them<sup>8</sup>, I must refer my readers for any thing like a detailed history of interpretations: contenting myself with giving a brief classification of the different great divisions of opinion, and with stating the grounds and character of the interpretation adopted in the following Commentary.

2. The schools of apocalyptic interpretation naturally divide themselves into three principal branches:

- a. The Præterists, or those who hold that the whole or by far the greater part of the prophecy has been fulfilled:
- b. The Historical Interpreters, or those who hold that the prophecy embraces the whole history of the church and its foes from the time of its writing to the end of the world:
- c. The Futurists, or those who maintain that the prophecy relates entirely to events which are to take place at or near to the coming of the Lord.

I shall make a few remarks on each of these schools.

3. a. The Præterist view found no favour, and was hardly so much as <sup>7</sup> It is to be regretted that Lücke should have performed this portion of his work so much in the spirit of a partisan, and not have contented himself with giving a résumé ab extra in the spirit of fairness, as Mr. Elliott has done. But his notices and remarks are very able and valuable.

thought of, in the times of primitive Christianity. Those who lived near the date of the book itself had no idea that its groups of prophetic imagery were intended merely to describe things then passing, and to be in a few years completed<sup>9</sup>. The view is said to have been first promulgated in any thing like completeness by the Jesuit Alcasar, in his "Investigation of the secret sense in the Apocalypse," published in 1614. He regarded the prophecy as descriptive of the victory of the church first over the synagogue, in chapters v.—xi., and then over heathen Rome, in chapters xii.—xix.: on which follows the triumph, and rest, and glorious close, chapters xx.—xxii. Very nearly the same plan was adopted by Grotius in his Annotations, published in 1644: and by our own Hammond in his Commentary, published in 1653: whom Le Clerc, his Latin interpreter, followed. The next name among this school of interpreters is that of Bossuet, the great antagonist of Protestantism. His Commentary was published in 1690. In the main, he agrees with the schemes of Alcasar and Grotius<sup>1</sup>.

4. The Præterist school of interpretation has however of late been revived in Germany, and is that to which some of the most eminent expositors of that nation belong<sup>2</sup>: limiting the view of the Seer to matters within his own horizon, and believing the whole denunciations of the book to regard nothing further than the destruction of Pagan and persecuting Rome.

5. This view has also found exponents in our own language. It is that of the very ample and laborious Commentary of Moses Stuart in America, and of Dr. Davidson and Mr. Desprez in England.

6. b. The continuous historical interpretation belongs almost of necessity to these later days. In early times, the historic material since the apostolic period was not copious enough to tempt men to fit it on to the symbols of the prophetic visions. The first approach to it seems to have been made by Berengaud, not far from the beginning of the twelfth century: who however carried the historic range of the Apocalypse back to the creation of the world<sup>3</sup>. The historic view is found in the fragmentary exposition of the Seals by Anselm of Havelburg (1145): in the important exposition by the Abbot Joachim (about 1200)<sup>4</sup>.

7. From Joachim's time we may date the rise of the continuous historic school of interpretation. From this time men's minds, even within

the Romish church, became accustomed to the ideas, that the apocalyptic Babylon was in some sense or other not only Pagan but Papal Rome: and that Antichrist was to sit, whether as an usurper or not, on the throne of the Papacy.

8. I pass over less remarkable names, which will be found composing an interesting series in Mr. Elliott's history<sup>5</sup>, noticing as I pass, that such was the view held by the precursors and upholders of the Reformation: by Wicliffe and his followers in England, by Luther in Germany, Bullinger in Switzerland, Bishop Bale in Ireland; by Fox the martyrologist, by Brightmann, Pareus, and early Protestant expositors generally.

9. As we advance in order of time, the same view holds its ground in the main among the Protestant churches. It is, with more or less individual varieties and divergences, that of Mede (1630), Jurieu (1685), Cressener (1690), Vitringa (1705), Daubuz (1720), Sir Isaac Newton (first published in 1733, after his death; but belonging to an earlier date), Whiston (1706), and the Commentators further on in that century, Bengel and Bishop Newton.

10. Mr. Elliott very naturally makes the great French Revolution a break, and the beginning of a new epoch, in the history of apocalyptic interpretation. From it, the continuous historical view seemed to derive confirmation and consistency, and acquired boldness to enter into new details, and fix its dates with greater precision.

11. Some of the more marked upholders of the view since that great Revolution have been divided among themselves as to the question, whether the expected second advent of our Lord is to be regarded as preceding or succeeding the thousand years' reign, or millennium. The majority both in number, and in learning and research, adopt the premillennial advent: following, as it seems to me, the plain and undeniable sense of the sacred text of the book itself.

12. It is not the purpose of the present Introduction to open controversial dispute with systems or with individuals. The following Commentary will shew how far our views agree with, how far they differ from, the school of which I am treating. With this caution, I cannot refrain from expressing my admiration of the research and piety which have characterized some of the principal modern Protestant expositors of this school. I must pay this tribute more especially to Mr. Elliott, from whose system and conclusions I am compelled so frequently and so widely to diverge<sup>6</sup>.

<sup>6</sup> The statement made above in the text will account for my not having noticed in detail, with a view to refutation, Mr. Elliott's work, "Apocalypsis Alfordiana," published since the appearance of this volume of my Greek Testament. A careful perusal of that work has not altered my view on any of the points of interpretation whereon we differ. Its arguments are not formidable, consisting for the most part of confident

13. c. Our attention now passes to the Futurist school, consisting of those who throw forward the whole book, or by far the greater part of it, into the times of the great second Advent, denying altogether its historical significance.

14. Of these writers, some, who have been called the extreme futurists<sup>7</sup>, deny even the past existence of the seven Asiatic churches, and hold that we are to look for them yet to arise in the last days: but the majority accept them as historical facts, and begin the events of the last days with the prophetic imagery in chap. iv. Some indeed expound the earlier seals of events already past, and then in the later ones pass at once onward to the times of antichrist.

15. The founder of this system in modern times (the Apostolic Fathers can hardly with fairness be cited for it, seeing that for them all was future) appears to have been the Jesuit Ribera, about A.D. 1580<sup>8</sup>. It has of late had some able advocates in this country. To it belong the respected names of Dr. Maitland, Dr. Todd, Mr. Burgh, Isaac Williams, and others.

16. I need hardly say that I cannot regard this scheme of interpretation with approval. To argue against it here, would be only to anticipate the Commentary. It seems to me indisputable that the book does speak of things past, present, and future: that some of its prophecies are already fulfilled, some are now fulfilling, and others await their fulfilment in the yet unknown future: but to class all together and postpone them to the last age of the world, seems to me very like shrinking from the labours which the Holy Spirit meant us, and invites us, to undertake.

17. In the exposition of the Apocalypse attempted in this volume, I have endeavoured simply to follow the guidance of the sacred text, according to its own requirements and the analogies of Scripture. I am not conscious of having any where forced the meaning to suit my own prepossession: but I have in each case examined, whither the text itself and the rest of Scripture seemed to send me for guidance. If a definite meaning seemed to be pointed at in such guidance, I have upheld that meaning, to whatever school of interpretation I might seem thereby for the time to belong. If no such definite meaning seemed to be indicated, re-assertion of the system which they uphold. In preparing the last edition of this portion of my Greek Testament, I began by inserting in the notes elaborate answers to them: but I found that thus my pages became burdened with matter merely controversial, and moreover that I could not continue this course consistently with the unfeigned respect, which I felt and wished to shew towards Mr. Elliott: the spirit of his book, which I forbear here from characterizing, rendering this wholly impossible.

18. The result of such a method of interpretation may be apparent want of system ; but I submit that it is the only way which will conduct us safely as far as we go, and which will prevent us from wresting the text to make it suit a preconceived scheme. This latter fault seemed to me so glaring and so frequent in our expositors of the historical school, and inspired me with such disgust, that I determined my own pages should not contain a single instance of it, if I could help it. And I venture to hope that the determination has been carried out.

19. The course which I have taken, that of following the text itself under the guidance of Scripture analogy, naturally led to the recognition of certain landmarks, or fixed points, giving rise to canons of interpretation, which I maintain are not to be departed from. Such are for instance the following:

20. The close connexion between our Lord's prophetic discourse on the Mount of Olives, and the line of apocalyptic prophecy, cannot fail to have struck every student of Scripture. If it be suggested that such connexion may be merely apparent, and we subject it to the test of more accurate examination, our first impression will I think become continually stronger, that the two, being revelations from the same Lord concerning things to come, and those things being as it seems to me bound by the fourfold cry, Come, which introduces the seals, to the same reference to Christ's coming, must, corresponding as they do in order and significance, answer to one another in detail ; and thus the discourse in Matt. xxiv. becomes, as Mr. Isaac Williams has truly named it, "the anchor of apocalyptic interpretation :" and, I may add, the touchstone of apocalyptic systems. If its guidance be not followed in the interpretation of the seals : if any other than our Lord is he that goes forth conquering and to conquer, then, though the subsequent interpretation may have occasional points of contact with truth, and may thus be in parts profitable to us, the system is an erroneous one, and, as far as it is concerned, the true key to the book is lost.

21. Another such landmark is found I believe in the interpretation of the sixth seal: if it be not indeed already laid down in what has just been said. We all know what that imagery means in the rest of Scripture. Any system which requires it to belong to another period than the close approach of the great day of the Lord, stands thereby self-condemned. I may illustrate this by reference to Mr. Elliott's continuous historical system, which requires that it should mean the downfall of Paganism under Constantine. A more notable instance of inadequate interpretation cannot be imagined.

22. Closely connected with this last is another fixed point in interpretation. As the seven seals, so the seven trumpets and the seven vials run on to the time close upon the end. At the termination of each series, the note is unmistakeably given, that such is the case. Of the seals we have already spoken. As to the trumpets, it may suffice to refer to ch. x. 7, xi. 18: as to the vials, to their very designation "these last," and to the declaration "they are past," of ch. xvi. 17. Any system which does not recognize this common ending of the three, seems to me to stand thereby convicted of error.

23. Another such absolute requirement of the sacred text is found in the vision of ch. xii. 1 ff. In ver. 5, we read that the woman "brought forth a male child, who shall rule (shepherd) the nations with a rod of iron: and her child was caught up to God and to His throne." All Scripture analogy and that of this book itself (compare ch. xix. 15) requires that these words should be understood of our incarnate Lord, and of no other. Any system seems to me convicted of error, which is compelled to interpret the words otherwise.

24. Another canon of interpretation has seemed to me to be deducible from the great care and accuracy with which the Seer distinguishes between the divine Persons and the ministering angels. Much confusion is found in the apocalyptic commentaries from this point not being attended to. "Is such or such an angel Christ Himself, or not?" is a question continually meeting us in their pages. Such a question need never to have been asked. An angel, throughout the book, is strictly and literally an angel: never our Lord, never one of the sons of men. This holds equally, I believe, of the angels of the seven churches and of the various angels introduced in the prophetic vision.

25. Other rules and requirements of the same kind will be found mentioned in the Commentary itself. It may be well to speak of some other matters which seem worthy of notice here.

26. The apocalyptic numbers furnish an important enquiry to every Commentator, as to their respective significance. And, in general terms, such a question can be readily answered. The various numbers seem to keep constant to their great lines of symbolic meaning, and may, without any caprice, be assigned to them. Thus seven is the number of perfection: seven spirits are before the throne (ch. i. 4; iv. 5): seven churches represent the church universal: the Lamb has seven horns and seven eyes (v. 6): in the several series of God's judgments, each of them complete in itself, each of them exhaustive in its own line of divine action, seven is the number of the seals, of the trumpets, of the thunders, of the vials.

27. Four, again, is the number of terrestrial extension. Four living-beings are the celestial symbols of creation (iv. 6 ff.): four angels stand on the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds of heaven (ch. vii. 1): four seals, four trumpets, four vials, in each case complete the judgments as far as physical visitations are concerned: four angels are loosed from the Euphrates to slay the destined portion out of all mankind (ix. 13 ff.), in obedience to a voice from the four corners of the altar: Satan deceives the nations in the four corners of the earth (xx. 8): the new Jerusalem lieth four-square, having all sides equal.

28. Twelve is the number especially appropriated to the Church, and to appearances symbolically connected with her. Twice twelve is the number of the heavenly elders: twelve times twelve thousand, the number of the sealed elect: the woman in ch. xii. 1 has a crown of twelve stars: the heavenly city has twelve gates, at the gates twelve angels, and on them the names of the twelve tribes of Israel; also twelve foundations, and on them the names of the twelve Apostles: and its circumference (probably: see note, ch. xxi. 17) is twelve thousand stadii. Finally, in the midst of her the tree of life brings forth twelve manner of fruits.

29. The occurrence of aliquot portions of these numbers is also worthy of our attention. The half of seven, three and a half, is a ruling number in the apocalyptic periods of time. Three years and a half had been the duration of the drought prayed for by Elijah (see James v. 17, note: also Luke iv. 25): "a time, and times, and the dividing of time" was the prescribed prophetic duration of the oppression of the saints in Dan. vii. 25. Accordingly, we find in the Apocalypse (ch. xi. 2) that the two witnesses, one of whose powers is, to shut up heaven that there shall be no rain (xi. 6), shall prophesy 1260 days =  $3 \times 360 + 180$  = three years and a half. And if this particular reminds us of Elijah, the other, the turning the water into blood and smiting the earth with plagues, directs our attention to Moses, whose testimony endured throughout the forty and two stations of the children of Israel's pilgrimage, as that of these witnesses is to endure forty and two months =  $3 \times 12 + 6$  months = three years and a half. (Again, for three days and a half shall the bodies of these witnesses lie unburied in the street of the great city, after which they shall rise again.) The same period in days (1260) is the term during which the woman shall be fed in the wilderness (xii. 6). The same in months (42) is allotted (xiii. 5) to the power of the first wild-beast which ascended from the sea.

30. I have not pretended to offer any solution of these periods of time, so remarkably pervaded by the half of the mystic seven. I am quite unable to say, who the two witnesses are: quite unable, in common with all apocalyptic interpreters, to point out definitely any period in the history of the church corresponding to the 1260 days of ch. xii. 6, or any in the history of this world's civil power which shall satisfy the forty-two months of ch. xiii. 5. As far as I have seen, every such attempt hitherto made has been characterized by signal failure. One after another, the years fixed on for the consummation by different authors have passed away, beginning with the 1836 of Beugel: one after another, the expositors who have lived to be thus refuted have shifted their ground into the safer future.

31. It is not my intention to enter the lists on either side of the vexed "year-day" question. I have never seen it proved, or even made probable, that we are to take a day for a year in apocalyptic prophecy: on the other hand I have never seen it proved, or made probable, that such mystic periods are to be taken literally, a day for a day. It is a weighty argument against the year-day system, that a period of "a thousand years" (xx. 6, 7) does occur in the prophecy: it is hardly a less strong one against literal acceptance of days, that the principles of interpretation given us by the Seer himself (xvii. 17) seem to require for the reign of the beast a far longer period than this calculation would allow. So that in the apparent failure of both systems, I am driven to believe that these periods are to be assigned by some clue, of which the Spirit has not yet put the Church in possession.

32. Still less can I offer any satisfactory solution of the prophetic number of the Beast (xiii. 18). Even while I print my note in favour of the Lateinos of Irenæus, I feel almost disposed to withdraw it. It is beyond question the best solution that has been given: but that it is not the solution, I have a persuasion amounting to certainty. It must be considered merely as worthy to emerge from the thousand and one failures strowed up and down in our books, and to be kept in sight till the challenge "here is wisdom" is satisfactorily redeemed.

33. On one point I have ventured to speak strongly, because my conviction on it is strong, founded on the rules of fair and consistent interpretation. I mean, the necessity of accepting literally the first resurrection, and the millennial reign. It seems to me that if in a sentence where two resurrections are spoken of with no mark of distinction between them (it is otherwise in John v. 28, which is commonly alleged for the view which I am combating),—in a sentence where, one resurrection having been related, "the rest of the dead" are afterwards mentioned,—we are at liberty to understand the former one figuratively and spiritually, and the latter literally and materially, then there is an end of all definite meaning in plain words, and the Apocalypse, or any other book, may mean any thing we please. It is a curious fact that those who maintain this, studious as they generally are to uphold the primitive interpretation, are obliged, not only to wrest the plain sense of words, but to desert the unanimous consent of the primitive Fathers, some of whom lived early enough to have retained apostolic tradition on this point. Not till millennial views had run into unspiritual excesses, was this interpretation departed from<sup>9</sup>.

<sup>9</sup> The student who can read German will find a good account of the history of opinions on this subject in Herzog's Encyclopædie, art. Chiliasmus.

34. It now remains that I say somewhat respecting my own view of the character and arrangement of the prophecy, which may furnish the reader with a general idea of the nature of the interpretation given in the notes.

35. And first for the principles on which that interpretation is based.

a) The book is a revelation given by the Father to Christ, and imparted by Him through His angel to St. John, to declare to His servants things which must shortly come to pass: in other words, the future conflicts and triumphs of His church; these being the things which concerned "His servants."

36. b) Of all these, the greatest event is His own coming in glory. In consequence, it is put forward in the introduction of the book with all solemnity, and its certainty sealed by an asseveration from the Almighty and Everlasting God.

37. c) Accordingly, we find every part of the prophecy full of this subject. The Epistles to the Churches continually recur to it: the visions of seals, trumpets, vials, all end in introducing it: and it forms the solemn conclusion, as it did the opening of the book.

38. d) But it was not the first time that this great subject had been spoken of in prophecy. The Old Testament prophets had all announced it: and the language of this book is full of the prophetic imagery which we also find in them. The first great key to the understanding of the Apocalypse, is, the analogy of Old Testament prophecy.

39. e) The next is our Lord's own prophetic discourse, before insisted on in this reference. He himself had previously delivered a great prophecy, giving in clear outline the main points of the history of the church. In this prophecy, the progress of the Gospel, its hindrances and corruptions, the judgments on the unbelieving, the trials of the faithful, the safety of God's elect amidst all, and the final redemption in glory of His faithful people, were all indicated. There, they were enwrapped in language which was in great part primarily applicable to the great typical judgment on the chosen people—the destruction of Jerusalem. When this book was written, that event had taken place: completing the first and partial fulfilment of our Lord's predictions. Now, it remained for prophecy to declare to the church God's course of dealing with the nations of the earth, by which the same predictions are to be again fulfilled, on a larger scale, and with greater fulness of meaning.

40. It is somewhat astonishing, that many of those who recognize to the full the character of the prophetic discourse of our Lord as applying to the last days, should have failed to observe in the Apocalypse the very same features of arrangement, and an analogy challenging continual observation.

41. f) In accordance with the analogy just pointed out, I conceive that the opening section of the book (after the vision in the introduction), containing the Epistles to the Churches, is an expansion of our Lord's brief notes of comfort, reproof, and admonition addressed to His own in the prophecy on the Mount of Olives and elsewhere in His prophetic discourses.

42. "It reveals to us our Lord as present with His people evermore in the fulness of His divine Majesty as the Incarnate and glorified Son of God: present with them by His Spirit to sympathize, to sustain, to comfort, to reprove, to admonish, as their need requires: his eye evermore on every heart, his love ever ready to supply all their need. The Epistles are no other than the expression of that special message of rebuke or encouragement which day by day in all ages the Lord sees to be needed, in one or other of its parts, by every Church, and every Christian, on earth. Every body of Christians, we are reminded, like every individual, has at each moment, its own definite religious character and condition: like Ephesus, sound, but with declining love and faith: like Smyrna, faithful in tribulation and rich in good works: like Pergamum, stedfast under open trial, but too tolerant of compromises with the world's ways: like Thyatira, diligent in well-doing, and with many signs of spiritual progress, yet allowing false teaching and corrupt practice to go unchecked: like Sardis, retaining the form of sound doctrine, but in practice sunk into a deep slumber threatening spiritual death: like Philadelphia, faithful to the Lord's word and name, loving Him though in weakness, and therefore kept in safety: or finally, like Laodicea, 'lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot:' self-satisfied, because sunk too deep in spiritual sloth and indifference to be conscious of her poverty, and ready therefore to lose all without struggle or regret<sup>2</sup>."

43. This first section has set before us the Lord present with His church on earth: the next introduces us at once to His presence in heaven, and to the celestial scenery of the whole coming prophecy. It is to be noted that this revelation of God is as the God of His Church. The Father, seated on the Throne: the Lamb in the midst of the throne, bearing the marks of His atoning sacrifice: the sevenfold Spirit with His lamps of fire: this is Jehovah the covenant God of His redeemed. And next we have Creation, symbolized by the four living-beings—the Church, patriarchal and apostolic, represented by the twenty-four elders: and the innumerable company of angels, ministering in their glory and might, now by one of them, now by another, throughout the course of the prophecy.

44. In the next section, the Lamb, alone found worthy, opens one after another, the seals of the closed book or roll, so that, when they are all opened, it may be unrolled and read. One point I have urged in the following notes: viz., that the roll is never during the prophecy actually opened, nor is any part of it read. The openings of its successive seals are but the successive preparations for its contents to be disclosed: and as each is opened, a new class of preparations is seen in prophetic vision. When the seventh is loosed, and all is ready for the unfolding and reading, there is a symbolic silence, and a new series of visions begins.

45. As regards the seals themselves, the first four are marked off from the other three in a manner which none can fail to observe. They represent, I believe, Christ's victory over the world in His appointed way. We have Himself going forth to conquer, and in His train, the sword which He came to send on earth, the wars, famines, and pestilences which He foretold should be forerunners of His coming. At each of these appearances, one of the living-beings who symbolize Creation echoes with his "Come" the sighs of the world for the manifestation of the sons of God. I conceive it to be a mistake, necessarily involved in the consecutive historical interpretation, but sometimes found where that is not, to interpret these four seals as succeeding one another in time. All are co-ordinate, all are correlative.

46. Next to the sighs of Creation for the Lord's coming, we have those of His martyred saints, crying from under His altar. Then, at the opening of the sixth seal, we have reproduced the well-known imagery of our Lord's discourse and of the Old Test. prophets, describing the very eve and threshold, so to speak, of the day of the Lord: the portents which should usher in His coming: but not that coming itself. For the revelation of this, the time is not yet. First, His elect must be gathered out of the four winds—the complete number sealed, before the judgments invoked by the martyred souls descend on the earth, the sea, the trees. First, the Seer must be vouchsafed a vision of the great multitude whom none can number, in everlasting glory. The day of the Lord's coming is gone by, and the vision reaches forward beyond it into the blissful eternity. Why? Because then, and not till then, shall the seventh seal, which looses the roll of God's eternal purposes, be opened, and the book read to the adoring Church in glory. Then we have the last seal opened, and the half-hour's silence—the "beginning," as Victorinus sublimely says, "of eternal rest."

47. Thus far the vision of the seals necessarily reached onward for its completion. But there is much more to be revealed. God's judgments on the earth and its inhabitants are the subject of the next series of visions. The prayers of the martyred saints had invoked them: with the symbolizing therefore of the answer to these prayers the next section opens. Then follow the trumpet-blowing angels, hurting the earth, the trees, the sea, the rivers, the lights of heaven. And here again, as before, the first four trumpets complete these world-wide judgments, and with the fifth the three woes on mankind begin. The previous plagues have affected only the accessories of life: the following affect life itself.

48. In these latter we have the strictest correspondence with the foregoing vision of the seals. Two of them are veritably plagues, the one of the locusts, the other of the horsemen. After this sixth trumpet are inserted two episodical passages, the one a vision, the other a prophecy (see below): then, when the seventh is about to sound, the consummation of God's judgments passes unrecorded, as it did under the seals; and at the seventh trumpet, we have the song of thanksgiving and triumph in heaven. Such remarkable and intimate correspondence carries its own explanation: the two visions of the trumpets and seals run on to one and the same glorious termination: the former, in tracing the course of the world as regards the Church, the latter, in tracing God's judgments of vengeance on the ungodly dwellers on earth: for it is for this that the heavenly song at its conclusion gives thanks.

49. If now we turn to the two episodes between the sixth and seventh trumpets, we find them distinctly introductory to that section which is next to follow. A little book is given to the Seer, sweet to his mouth, but bitter in digestion, with an announcement that he is yet again to prophesy to many nations—that a fresh series of prophetic visions, glorious indeed but woeful, was now to be delivered by him.

50. These begin by the measurement of the temple of God—seeing that it is the Church herself, in her innermost hold, which is now to become the subject of the prophecy. The course of the two witnesses, recalling to us by their spirit and power Moses and Elias, is predicted: and during the prediction, one principal figure of the subsequent visions is by anticipation introduced: the wild-beast that cometh up out of the abyss. That this is so, is at once fatal in my estimation to the continuous historical interpretation.

51. The student will find that there is no explanation of the two witnesses in the ensuing Commentary. I have studied the various solutions, and I own that I cannot find any which I can endorse as being that which I can feel to be satisfactory. I have none of my own. I recognize the characters : but I cannot appropriate them. I do not feel it to be any reproach to my system, or any disproof of its substance, that there are this and other gaps in it which I cannot bridge over. Nay, on the contrary, if it be a sound interpretation, there must be these : and to find events and persons which may fit the whole, ere yet the course of time is run, would seem to me rather writing a parody, than earnestly seeking a solution.

52. And now the seventh angel sounds ; and as before at the opening of the seventh seal, the heavenly scene is before us, and the representatives of the church universal fall down and give thanks that God's kingdom is come, and the time of the dead to be judged. But though this series of visions likewise has been thus brought down to the end of the final consummation, there is more yet to be revealed ; and in anticipation of the character of the subsequent visions, the temple of God in heaven is opened, and the pause between one and another series is announced, as before between the seals and the trumpets, and as after at the end of the vials, by thunders and lightnings and voices.

53. And now opens the great prophetic course of visions regarding the church. Her identification in the eyes of the seer is first rendered unmistakeable, by the scene opening with the appearance of the woman and the serpent, the enmity between him and her seed, the birth of the Man-child who should rule over the nations—His ascension to heaven and to the throne of God. Here, at least, all ought to have been plain : and here again I see pronounced the condemnation of the continuous historical system.

54. The flight of the woman into the wilderness, the casting down of Satan from heaven no longer to curse the brethren there, his continued enmity on earth, his persecution of the remnant of the woman's seed, these belong to the introductory features of the great vision which is to follow, and serve to describe the state in which the Church of God is found during the now pending stage of her conflict.

55. What follows, carries out the description of the war made by the dragon on the seed of the woman. A wild-beast is seen rising out of the deep, uniting in itself the formerly described heads and horns of the dragon, and also the well-known prophetic symbols of the great empires of the world : representing, in fact, the secular powers antagonistic to the Church of Christ. To this wild-beast the dragon gives his might and his throne : and notwithstanding that one of its heads, the Pagan Roman Empire, is crushed to death, its deadly wound is healed, and all who are not written in the Lamb's book of life worship it.

56. The further carrying out of the power and influence of the beast is now set before us by the vision of another wild-beast, born of the earth, gentle as a lamb in appearance, but dragon-like and cruel in character. This second beast is the ally and servant of the former : makes men to worship its image and receive its mark, as the condition of civil rights and even of life itself. Here, in common with very many of the best interpreters, I cannot fail to recognize the sacerdotal persecuting power, leagued with and the instrument of the secular: professing to be a lamb, but in reality being a dragon: persecuting the saints of God; the inseparable companion and upholder of despotic and tyrannical power. This in all its forms, Pagan, Papal, and in so far as the Reformed Churches have retrograded towards Papal sacerdotalism, Protestant also, I believe to be that which is symbolized under the second wild-beast.

57. Next, the apocalyptic vision brings before us the Lamb on Mount Zion with the first-fruits of His people, and the heavenly song in which they join,—as prefatory to the announcement, by three angels, of the prophecies which are to follow, so full of import to the people and church of God. These are, first, the proclamation of the everlasting Gospel as previous to the final judgments of God: next, the fall of Babylon, as an encouragement for the patience of the saints: third, the final defeat and torment of the Lord's enemies. After these is heard a voice proclaiming the blessedness of the holy dead. Then follow, in strict accord with these four announcements, 1) the harvest and the vintage of the earth, and the seven last plagues, symbolized by the outpouring of the vials: 2) the ample details of the fall and punishment of Babylon: 3) the triumph of the Church in the last defeat of her Lord's enemies: 4) the millennial reign, and finally, the eternity of bliss. But on each of these somewhat more must be said.

58. I have found reason to interpret the harvest, of the ingathering of the Lord's people: the vintage, of the crushing of His enemies: both these being, according to the usage of this book, compendious, and inclusive of the fuller details of both, which are to follow.

59. The vintage is taken up and expanded in detail by the series of the vials: seven in number, as were the seals and the trumpets before. These final judgments, specially belonging to the Church, are introduced by a song of triumph from the saints of both dispensations, and are poured out by angels coming forth from the opened sanctuary of the tabernacle of witness in heaven.

60. The course of these judgments is in some particulars the same as that of the trumpets. The earth, the sea, the rivers, the lights of heaven—these are the objects of the first four: but ever with reference to those who worship the beast and have his mark on them. At the fifth, as in each case before, there is a change from general to special: the throne and kingdom of the beast, the river Euphrates, these are now the objects: and the seventh passes off, as in each former case, to the consummation of all things.

61. Meantime, as so often before, anticipating hints have been given of new details belonging to the other angelic announcements. At the sixth vial, we have the sounds of the gathering of an approaching battle of God's enemies against Him, and the very battle-field pointed out. After the seventh and its closing formula, Babylon comes into remembrance before God, to give her the cup of his vengeance. Thus then we pass to the second of the angelic announcements—the fall of Babylon. Here the Seer is carried in spirit into the wilderness, and shewn the great vision of the woman seated on the beast. I have entered in the Commentary into all the details of this important portion of the prophecy: and it is unnecessary to repeat them here. It may suffice to say, that the great persecuting city, the type of the union of ecclesiastical corruption with civil tyranny, is finally overthrown by the hands of those very kingdoms who had given their power to the beast, and this overthrow is celebrated by the triumphant songs of the Church and of Creation and of innumerable multitudes in heaven.

62. But here again, according to the practice of which I cannot too often remind the student, a voice from heaven announces the character of the new and final vision which is to follow: Blessed are they which are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb. And now, in the prophetic details of the third of the previous angelic announcements, and of the proclamation of the blessedness of the holy dead, the great events of the time of the end crowd, in their dread majesty, upon us. First, the procession of the glorified Redeemer with the armies of heaven following Him, coming forth to tread the winepress of the wrath of Almighty God. Then, the great battle of the Lord against His foes, the beast and the false prophet, leagued with the kings of the earth against Him. Then, the binding of the dragon, the old serpent, for a season. Then, the first resurrection, the judgment of the church, the millennial reign: as to which I have again and again raised my earnest protest against evading the plain sense of words, and spiritualizing in the midst of plain declarations of fact. That the Lord will come in person to this our earth: that His risen elect will reign here with Him and judge: that during that blessed reign the power of evil will be bound, and the glorious prophecies of peace and truth on earth find their accomplishment:—this is my firm persuasion, and not mine alone, but that of multitudes of Christ's waiting people, as it was that of his primitive apostolic Church, before controversy blinded the eyes of the Fathers to the light of prophecy.

63. But the end is not yet. One struggle more, and that the last. At the end of the millennial period, Satan is unloosed, and the nations of the earth are deceived by him—they come up against and encircle the camp of the saints and the beloved city: and fire comes down out of heaven and consumes them: and the devil who deceived them is cast into the lake of fire. Then is described the general judgment of the dead, the destruction of death and Hades, and the condemnation of all whose names are not found written in the book of life.

The Vision of the Lord in glory. Seven golden candlesticks: in the midst of them one like the Son of Man: His glorious appearance, seven stars in his hand, a sharp two-edged sword going out of His mouth. The seven stars are the angels of the seven Churches, and the seven candlesticks are the seven Churches.

64. Finally, in accord with the previous proclamation of the blessedness of the holy dead, the description of the heavenly Jerusalem forms the glorious close of the whole.

65. It remains that I say a few words in explanation of the annexed Table, which contains an arrangement of the Apocalyptic matter in accordance with the view upheld above.

66. In the upper part of the table, extending all across it, are specified the general subject of the book, printed in black, and the Epistles to the seven churches. Then follow, printed in red, the heavenly scenery and personages common to the whole following prophecy, till all the various visions merge, at the bottom of each column, in the new heavens and new earth, the description of which is again printed in red across the table beneath the columns.

67. The columns themselves contain the various visions, followed by the episodes which occur in them, in order : each in turn passing away into the great day of the Lord, and the events of the time of the end. Any one who has followed the Commentary, or even the epitome given in this Introduction, will have no difficulty in making use of the conspectus given in the table.

68. The words printed in thick type are intended to direct the reader's attention to their recurrence as furnishing landmarks, or tests of interpretation : e. g. the numbers, seven, four, twelve : the white horse and its Rider : the ruling the nations with a rod of iron, as unmistakably identifying the Man-child of ch. xii. with the Victor of ch. xix. : &c. &c.

69. I have now only to commend to my gracious God and Father this feeble attempt to explain the most mysterious and glorious portion of His revealed Scripture : and with it, this my labour of now four-and-twenty years, herewith completed. I do it with humble thankfulness, but with a sense of utter weakness before the power of His Word, and inability to sound the depths even of its simplest sentence. May He spare the hand which has been put forward to touch His Ark : may He, for Christ's sake, forgive all rashness, all perverseness, all uncharitableness, which may be found in this book, and sanctify it to the use of His Church : its truth, if any, for teaching : its manifold defect, for warning. My prayer is and shall be, that in the stir and labour of men over His word, to which these volumes have been one humble contribution, others may arise and teach, whose labours shall be so far better than mine, that this book, and its writer, may ere long be utterly forgotten.

CHAP. I. 1—II. 18.] AFTER MANIFOLD REVELATIONS IN FORMER TIMES, GOD HAS NOW REVEALED HIMSELF TO US IN HIS SON (i. 1—4), WHO IS GREATER THAN THE ANGELS, THE DISPENSERS OF THE LAW (i. 4—14; inference, ii. 1—4), THOUGH FOR A TIME HE WAS MADE LOWER THAN THE ANGELS, AND SUBJECTED TO SUFFERINGS, IN ORDER TO BE, AS OUR HIGH PRIEST, OUR RECONCILER TO GOD (ii. 5—18). And herein (i. 1—4), introduction and statement of position.

We may notice, 1. The opening of this Epistle without any address, or mention of the Author. Various reasons have been assigned for this, and inferences drawn from it (see Introduction). Some have said that the matter to be treated was so weighty, that the Writer merged altogether his own personality, and trusted to the weight of his subject to gain him a hearing. But this would not account for entire omission of the name of the man and his standing. Some have therefore imagined that another shorter letter of a more private nature must have accompanied this. But we may reply, that this idea derives no countenance from the phenomena of the Epistle itself, containing as it does at the end private notices which might well have been dispensed with, if such a commendatory Epistle had accompanied it. We must therefore deal with this circumstance without any such hypothesis to help us. On the supposition of the authorship by St. Paul, some account may be given of it,—viz. that the name of the Apostle was concealed, from the nature of the relations between himself, and those to whom he was writing (see this hypothesis examined in the Introduction). And on the idea of superintendence by St. Paul, it would obviously admit of the same solution. 2. The carefully balanced and rhetorical style in which the Epistle begins, characteristic indeed of its whole diction, but especially marking this first period (vv. 1—4). The clauses are joined by close grammatical and rhetorical dependence: there is no breaking off, and no carelessness of construction, but all is most carefully and skilfully disposed.

1.] In many portions (or 'parts,' manifoldly as regards the distribution. "For not all things, nor the same things, were revealed to all the prophets, but the parts of great mysteries were distributed among them. E.g., Isaiah was inspired to foretell Christ's birth from a virgin, and His Passion: Daniel, the time of His Advent: Jonah, His burial: Malachi, the coming of His Forerunner. And again some had more, others less, revealed to them." Estius. 'At sundry times' (A.V.) is not an accurate rendering, nor can it be said to express the meaning: time is a historical condition of the sequence of parts,—persons to whom, an anthropological condition,—but it does not follow that 'at sundry times,' or 'to sundry persons,' gives the force of 'in divers parts?' because it might be the same thing which was revealed again and again. This revelation in portions, by fragments, in and by various persons, was necessarily an imperfect revelation, to which the one final manifestation in and by One Person is properly and logically opposed) and in divers manners ("in one way was He seen by Abraham, in another by Moses, in another by Elijah, in another by Michael. Isaiah, Daniel, and Ezekiel saw differing forms of vision." Theodoret. Bleek remarks, that in Numb. xii. 6—8, the diversity of manner of revelation is recognized: dreams and visions being set beneath that open speaking, mouth to mouth, which the Lord used towards His servant Moses. It will be seen, that I cannot agree with Chrysostom and many others in regarding the two adverbs as a mere rhetorical redundancy,—meaning merely, "differently." Both set forth the imperfection of the Old Test. revelations. They were various in nature and in form: fragments of the whole truth, presented in manifold forms, in shifting hues of separated colour: Christ is the full revelation of God, Himself the pure light, uniting in His one Person the whole spectrum: see below on ver. 3) in time past (generally interpreted of the Old Test. period, ending with Malachi. But there is no need for cutting off the period there. In the interim between Malachi and the Writer's time, though the Old Test. canon was closed, we cannot say that God's manifold revelations of Himself had absolutely ceased. Nay, strictly speaking, the Baptist himself belonged to the former, though he pointed on to the latter period. No doubt he was not here in the Writer's view, and the period of former revelations is here regarded as distinct from the final Christian one: but for all that, we must not put an artificial terminus where he puts none) God having spoken to the fathers (so in refl. The term "the fathers" is absolutely used in John vii. 22; Acts xiii. 32; Rom. ix. 5; xi. 28; xv. 8; 2 Pet. iii. 4. It is evident from this term being common to the Writer and his readers, where no reference is made to Jews in the context [as in Rom. ix. 5], that he was writing as a Jew and to Jews) in (not equivalent to "by," though it includes it. The in designates the element in which the speaking takes place, and holds therefore its own proper force. God spoke in the prophets, being resident in them. Bengel draws a distinction,—a human king speaks by his ambassadors, but not in them) the prophets (to be taken here apparently in the wider sense,—as including not only those whose inspired writings form the Old Test. canon, but all who were vehicles of the divine self-manifestation to the Fathers. Thus Enoch in Jude 14 is said to have prophesied. Moses is of course included, and indeed would on any view be the chief of those here spoken of, seeing that by him the greater part of God's revelation of Himself to the fathers was made).

2.] at the end of these days (in order to understand this expression, it will be well to call to mind certain Jewish modes of speaking of time. The Rabbis divided the whole of time into "this age," and "the age to come." The days of the Messiah were regarded as a period of transition from the former to the latter,—His appearance, as the ushering in of the termination of "these days," the beginning of the end,—and His second coming in glory as the accomplishment of "these days" or "this age." And with this, New Test. usage agrees,—see 1 Pet. i. 20; James v. 3; Jude 18; 2 Pet. iii. 3. Thus at the end of these days would mean, 'at the end of this age,' in the technical sense of these words as signifying the whole world-period, the latter boundary of which is the Resurrection. And thus is the manifestation of Christ in the flesh ever spoken of, and especially in this Epistle; compare ch. ix. 26; and notes on ch. ii. 5; vi. 5. Stuart has mistaken the meaning, in rendering 'during the last dispensation,' and making "these" to import that the period had already begun. It is not of a beginning, but of an expiring period, the Writer is speaking. The ancient expositors principally use these words as ground of consolation: those who were in conflict would be consoled on hearing that it was soon to end) spake (not 'hath spoken': the end just spoken of is looked back on as a definite point, at which the divine revelation took place. The attention of the readers is thus directed not so much to the present state in which they are, as to the act of God towards them) unto us (i. e. all who have heard that voice, or to whom it is to be announced. There is no distinction between those who received God's revelation immediately from the Son, and those who received it mediately through others. To this latter number belonged the Writer himself, compare ch. ii. 3) in (see above) His Son (literally, or rather, nearer the strict sense of the original, in Him who was Son of God. We now pass off into a description of the dignity, and person, and work, of this Son of God: which description ends in asserting and proving Him to be higher than angels, the loftiest of created beings) whom He constituted (not, "hath constituted," or "appointed:" referring, as also does made, which follows, to the time, "in the beginning,"—the date of the eternal counsel of God) heir ("appropriately, after the mention of Sonship, comes inheritance." Bengel. That heir is not equivalent to "lord" simply, is plain: the same expression could not have been used of the Father. It is in virtue of the Sonship of our Lord that the Father constituted Him heir of all things, before the worlds began. "In Him also," says Delitzsch, "culminates the fulfilment of the promise given to the seed of Abraham, that he should be heir of the world." See below. See for St. Paul's use of the word and image, Gal. iv. 7) of all things ("that is, of the whole world." Chrysostom. And we cannot give this a more limited sense, nor restrict it to this world; especially as the subsequent portion of the chapter distinctly includes the angels in it. It is much disputed whether this heirship of Christ is to be conceived as belonging to Him essentially in his divine nature, or as accruing to Him from his work of redemption in the human nature. The Fathers, and the majority of the moderns, decide for the latter alternative. "The Lord Christ is the heir of all things," says Theodoret, "not as God, but as man." And so the Socinian and quasi-Socinian interpreters, arriving at the same view by another way, not believing the pre-existence of Christ. But it is plain that such an interpretation will not suit the requirements of the passage. For this humiliation of His, with its effects, first comes in at the end of ver. 3. All this, now adduced, is referable to his essential Being as Son of God; not merely in the Godhead before his Incarnation, but also in the Manhood after it, which no less formed a part of His "constitution" by the Father, than His Godhead itself. So that the word "constituted" or "appointed," as observed above, must be taken not as an appointment in prospect of the Incarnation, but as an absolute appointment, coincident with the "this day have I begotten Thee," belonging to the eternal Sonship of the Lord, though wrought out in full by his mediatorial work), by whom (by means of whom, as His acting Power and personal instrument: so Theophylact: "Since the Father is the cause of the Son, He is also of the things which were made by Him. The Father, who begat the Son their maker, seems to make them Himself") He also made (created). The word brought into emphasis by also is not the world, but made. "He not only appointed the Son heir of all things, before the Creation; but He also made the worlds by Him." Bengel) the ages (so literally; but the meaning of the term has been much disputed. The main classes of interpreters are two. (1) Those who see in the word its ordinary meaning of 'an age of time;' (2) those who do not recognize such meaning, but suppose it to have been merged in that of "the world," or "the worlds." To (1) belong the Greek Fathers; and some others. On the other hand, (2) is the view of the majority of Commentators. It is explained and defended at length by Bleek, none of whose examples however seem to me to be void of the same ambiguity which characterizes the expression here. The Jews, it appears, came at length to designate by their phrase, "the present age," not only the present age, but all things in and belonging to it—and so of the "future age" likewise. He therefore would regard the ages as strictly parallel with "all things" above, and would interpret, 'Whom He has constituted lord, possessor and ruler over all, over the whole world, even as by Him He has made all, the universe.' And nearly so Delitzsch, Ebrard, and Lünemann: these two latter adding however somewhat, inasmuch as they take it of all this state of things constituted in time and space. And this last view I should be disposed to adopt, going however somewhat further still: for whereas Ebrard includes in the expression God's revelation of Himself in a sphere whose conditions are Time and Space, and so would understand by it all things existing under these conditions, I would include in it also these conditions themselves,—which exist not independently of the Creator, but are His work—His appointed conditions of all created existence. So that the universe, as well in its great primeval conditions,—the reaches of Space, and the ages of Time, as in all material objects and all successive events, which furnish out and people Space and Time, God made by Christ. It will be plain that what has been here said will apply equally to ch. xi. 3, which is commonly quoted as decisive for the material sense here. Some have endeavoured to refer the ages (3) to the new or spiritual world, or the ages of the Messiah, or of the Christian Church: principally in the interests of Socinianism: or (4), to the various dispensations of God's revelation of Himself: or even (5), as Fabricius, to the Gnostic æons, or emanations from the divine Essence, and so to the higher spiritual order of beings, the angels. Against all these, besides other considerations, ch. xi. 3 is a decisive testimony. It will be seen by consulting the note on John i. 1, how very near the teaching of Philo approached to this creation of the universe by the Son.

3.] "The Son of God now becomes Himself the subject. The verb belonging to the relative who is not found till 'sat down' at the end of the verse. But the intermediate participial clauses do not stand in the same relation to the main sentence. The first members, 'being, &c.,' still set forth those attributes of the Son of God which are of a permanent character, and belonging to Him before the Incarnation: whereas the following member, the last participial clause, stands in nearer relation to the main sentence, expressing as it does the purification of mankind from sin, wrought by the incarnate Son of God, as one individual historical event,—as the antecedent of that exaltation of Him to the right hand of God, which the main sentence enounces." Bleek.

Who (this represents, it will be evident, rather the præ-existent than the incarnate Word. But it is perhaps a mistake to let this distinction be too prominent, and would lead to the idea of a change having taken place in the eternal relation of the Son to the Father, when He subjected himself to the conditions of space and time. Even then He could say of Himself, "The Son of Man which is in heaven") being (see Phil. ii. 6, which is also said of His præ-existent and essential being) the brightness ("reflexion," not "effulgence." This latter would be legitimate, but does not seem to have been the ordinary usage. See Wisd. vii. 26, where wisdom is called "the brightness of the everlasting light." And this (which, as Delitzsch remarks, is represented by the "light of light" of the Nicene Creed) seems to have been universally the sense among the ancients: no trace whatever being found of the meaning 'reflexion.' Nor would the idea be apposite here: the Son of God is, in this his essential majesty, the expression, and the sole expression, of the divine Light,—not, as in his Incarnation, its reflexion) of His glory (not simply His light; nor need the expression be confined to such literal sense. His glory, in its widest and amplest reference), and express image (or, impress: 'figure,' Wiel. and Rheims versions: 'very image,' Tyndal and Cranmer: 'engraved form,' Geneva version. The word appears always to be taken for the impression stamped by a die. Hence it is taken generally for any fixed and sharply marked lineaments, material or spiritual, by which a person or an object may be recognized and distinguished) of His substance (substantial or essential being: 'substance,' Wiel. Tynd. Cranm. Rheims: 'person,' Geneva, and A. V. Etymologically, the original word (hypo-stasis) imports the lying or being placed underneath: and this is put in common usage for 1) substratum or foundation—fundamentum. Nearly connected with this is 2) establishment, or the state of being established: hence—a) firmness,—to which idea the word approaches in the last citation: but especially in reference to firmness of spirit, confidence; see more on ch. iii. 14,—b) substantial existence, reality, in contradistinction to that which exists only in appearance or idea. Hence—c) generally, consistence or existence,—d) it imports the especial manner of being, —the peculiar essence of an object. And this last seems to be the best meaning in our place: His essential being, His substance. For in regarding the history of the word, we find that the well-known theological meaning ‘person,’ was not by any means generally received during the first four centuries. The Nicene Council itself uses “hypostasis” and “essence” in the same sense, and condemns the deriving the Son from another hypostasis or essence from the Father: and so usually Athanasius. The fact was, that the Easterns most commonly used the term to designate the three separate Persons: whereas the Westerns continued to regard it as equivalent to essence, and assumed but one hypostasis: and the Western bishops, assembled with Athanasius at the council of Sardica in 347, distinctly pronounced the assumption of three hypostases heretical, i.e. Arian. Subsequently, however, to this, in the Synod assembled at Alexandria in 362, at which Athanasius, and bishops of Italy, Arabia, Egypt, and Libya were present, the Easterns and Westerns agreed, on examination of one another’s meaning, to acknowledge one another as orthodox, and to allow indifferently of the use of three hypostases, signifying ‘Persons,’ and one hypostasis, signifying substance, essence. On all grounds it will be safer here to hold to the primitive meaning of the word, and not to introduce into the language of the apostolic age a terminology which was long subsequent to it), and upholding (bearing up. The Rabbinical writings speak of God as carrying all the worlds by His strength) the universe (the meaning attempted to be given by some Socinian expositors, “the whole kingdom of grace,” is wholly beside the purpose: see Col. i. 17; Job. viii. 3; Rev. iv. 11) by the word (expressed command: compare ch. xi. 3) of his (Whose? His own, or the Father’s? The latter is held by Cyril of Alexandria. And so Grotius and others. But Chrysostom and the great body of Commentators understand his to refer to the Son. The strict parallelism of the clauses would seem to require, that his here should designate the same person, as it does before in this same verse. But such parallelism and consistency of reference of demonstrative pronouns is by no means observed in the New Test., e.g. Eph. i. 20, 22, “And placed Him at His right hand (of the Father), . . . and put all things under His feet” (of the Son). In every such case the reference must be determined by the circumstances, and the things spoken of. And applying that test here, we find that in our former clause it is quite out of the question that his should be reflective, referring, as it clearly does, to another than the subject of the sentence. But when we proceed to our second clause, we find no such bar to the ordinary reflective sense of his, but every reason to adopt it as the most obvious. For we have here an action performed by the Son, who upholds the universe. Whereby? By the word of His power: where we may certainly say 1) that had another than the subject of the sentence been intended, such intention would have been expressed: and 2) that the assertion would be after all a strange and unexampled one, that the Son upholds all things by the word of the Father’s power. So that, on all accounts, this second his seems better to be referred to the Son) power (not to be weakened into the comparatively unmeaning “his powerful word.” His Power is an inherent attribute, whether uttered or not: the word is that utterance, which He has been pleased to give of it. It is a “powerful word,” but much more is here stated—that it is the word of, proceeding from, giving utterance to, His power), having (or, when He had) made (the vulgate, “making,” is an unfortunate mistranslation, tending to obscure the truth of the completion of the one Sacrifice of the Lord. The words “by Himself” can hardly be retained in the text, in the face of their omission in the most ancient MSS., joined to their internal character as an explanatory gloss. Meanwhile, the gloss is a good and true one. It was by Himself, in the fullest sense) purification of sins (as Bleek observes, there is no occasion to suppose the genitive here equivalent to “from sins,” seeing that we may say, “the sins of a man are purified,” as we read, Matt. viii. 3, “his leprosy was cleansed.” Sin was the great uncleanness, of which He has effected the purgation : the disease of which He has wrought the cure. This purification must be understood by the subsequent argument in the Epistle : for that which the Writer had in his mind to expand in the course of his treatise, he must be supposed to have meant when he used without explanation a concise term, like this. And that we know to have been, the purifications and sacrifices of the Levitical law, by which man's natural uncleanness in God's sight was typically removed, and access to God laid open to him. Ebrard's note here is so important that, though long, I cannot forbear inserting it. "The term purification answers to the Hebrew, and its ideal explanation must be sought in the meaning which suits the Levitical cleansing in the Old Test. worship. Consequently, they are entirely wrong, who understand this purification of moral amelioration, and would so take the 'making purification' in this place, as if the author wished to set forth Christ here as a moral teacher, who by precept and example incited men to amendment. And we may pronounce those in error, who go so far indeed as to explain the purification of the propitiatory removal of the guilt of sin, but only on account of later passages in our Epistle, as if the idea of scriptural purification were not already sufficiently clear to establish this, the only true meaning. The whole law of purification, as given by God to Moses, rested on the assumption that our nature, as sinful and guilt-laden, is not capable of coming into immediate contact with our holy God and Judge. The mediation between man and God present in the most holy place, and in that most holy place separated from the people, was revealed in three forms ; (a) in sacrifices, (b) in the Priesthood ; and (c) in the Levitical laws of purity. Sacrifices were [typical] acts or means of propitiation for guilt ; Priests were the agents for accomplishing these acts, but were not themselves accounted purer than the rest of the people, having consequently to bring offerings for their own sins before they offered for those of the people. Lastly, Levitical purity was the condition which was attained, positively by sacrifice and worship, negatively by avoidance of Levitical pollution,—the condition in which the people was enabled, by means of the priests, to come into relation with God 'without dying' [Deut. v. 26] ; the result of the cultus which was past, and the postulate for that which was to come. So that that which purified, was sacrifice : and the purification was, the removal of guilt. This is most clearly seen in the ordinance concerning the great day of atonement, Lev. xvi. There we find those three leading features in the closest distinctive relation. First, the sacrifice must be prepared [vv. 1—10] ; then, the High Priest is to offer for his own sins [vv. 11—14] ; lastly, he is to kill the sin-offering for the people [ver. 15], and with its blood to sprinkle the mercy-seat and all the holy place, and cleanse it from the uncleanness of the children of Israel [ver. 19] ; and then he is symbolically to lay the sins of the people on the head of a second victim, and send forth this animal, laden with the curse, into the wilderness. For [ver. 30] 'on that day shall the priest make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the Lord.' In the atonement, in the gracious covering of the guilt of sin, consists purification in the scriptural sense. [And so also were those who had become levitically unclean, e.g., lepers, Levit. xiv., cleansed by atoning sacrifices.] So that an Israelitish reader, a Christian Jew, would never, on reading the words made purification, think on what we commonly call 'moral amelioration,' which, if not springing out of the living ground of a heart reconciled to God, is mere self-deceit, and only external avoidance of evident transgression : but the purification which Christ brought in would, in the sense of our author and his readers, only be understood of that gracious atonement for all guilt of sin of all mankind, which Christ our Lord and Saviour has completed for us by His sinless sufferings and death : and out of which flows forth to us, as from a fountain, all power to love in return, all love to Him, our heavenly Pattern, and all hatred of sin, which caused His death. To speak these words of Scripture with the mouth is easy : but he only can say Yea and Amen to them with the heart who, in simple truthfulness of the knowledge of himself, has looked down even to the darkest depths of his ruined state, natural to him, and intensified by innumerable sins of act,—and, despairing of all help in himself, reaches forth his hand after the good tidings of heavenly deliverance." It is truly refreshing, in the midst of so much unbelief, and misapprehension of the sense of Scripture, in the German commentators, to meet with such a clear and full testimony to the truth and efficacy of the Lord's great Sacrifice. And I am bound to say that the other great Germans recognize this just as fully, sat down on the right hand (literally, 'in the right hand,' viz., portion or side). The expression comes doubtless originally from Ps. ex. 1, cited below. Bleek, in the course of a long and thorough discussion of its meaning as applied to our Lord, shews that it is never used of his pre-existent coequality with the Father, but always with reference to His exaltation in his humanity after his course of suffering and triumph. It is ever connected, not with the idea of His equality with the Father and share in the majesty of the Godhead, but with His state of waiting, in the immediate presence of the Father, and thus highly exalted by Him, till the purposes of his mediatorial office are accomplished. This his lofty state is, however, not one of quiescence; for (Acts ii. 33) He shed down the gift of the Spirit, —and (Rom. viii. 34) He maketh intercession for us: and below (ch. viii. 1 ff.) He is, for all purposes belonging to that office, our High Priest in Heaven. This "sitting at the right hand of God" is described as lasting until all enemies shall have been subdued unto Him, i.e. until the end of this state of time, and his own second coming: after which, properly and strictly speaking, the state of exaltation described by these words shall come to an end, and that mysterious completion of the supreme glory of the Son of God shall take place, which St. Paul describes, 1 Cor. xv. 28) of Majesty (this word majesty is often found in the Septuagint, and principally as referring to the divine greatness) on high (in high places, i.e. in heaven). Compare Ps. xciii. 4, cxlii. 5; Isa. xxxii. 15, xxxiii. 5; Jer. xxv. 30. In the same sense we have "in the highest," Luke ii. 14; xix. 38; Job xvi. 20; Eccles. xxvi. 16; Matt. xxi. 9; Mark xi. 10. Ebrard says: "HEAVEN, in Holy Scripture, signifies never unbounded space, nor omnipresence, but always either the starry firmament, or, more usually, that sphere of the created world of space and time, where the union of God with the personal creature is not severed by sin,—where no Death reigns, where the glorification of the body is not a mere hope of the future. Into that sphere has the Firstling of risen and glorified manhood entered, as into a place, with visible glorified Body, visibly to return again from thence." The omission of the article "the" here gives majesty and solemnity —its insertion would seem to hint at other majesties in the background), having become (distinct from "being," ver. 3: that, importing His essential, this, His superinduced state. For we are now, in the course of the enunciation,—which has advanced to the main subject of the argument, the proving of the superiority of the New Covenant,—treating of the post-incarnate majesty of the Son of God. He was all that has been detailed in ver. 3: He made purification of sins, and sat down at the right hand of the majesty on high, and thus BECAME this which is now spoken of. This is denied by Chrysostom, but recognized by Theodoret, in a form however not strictly exact: for he applied it only to the Humanity of our Lord. To this Bleek very properly objects, that the making this exaltation belong only to Christ's human nature, and supposing Him to have while on earth possessed still the fulness of the majesty of his Godhead, is not according to the usage of our Writer, nor of the New Test. generally, and in fact induces something like a double personality in the Son of God. The Scriptures teach us that He who was with God before the creation, from love to men put on flesh, and took the form of a servant, not all the while having on Him the whole fulness of his divine nature and divine glory, but having really and actually emptied himself of this fulness and glory, so that there was not only a hiding, but an absolute inaniition, a putting off, of it. Therefore His subsequent exaltation must be conceived of as belonging, not to his Humanity only, but to the entire undivided Person of Christ, now resuming the fulness and glory of the Godhead (John xvii. 5), and in addition to this having taken into the Godhead the Manhood, now glorified by his obedience, atonement, and victory. See Eph. i. 20—22; Phil. ii. 6—9; Acts ii. 36; 1 Pet. iii. 21, 22. The Son of God before his Incarnation was Head over Creation: but after his work in the flesh he had become also Head of Creation, inasmuch as his glorified Body, in which He triumphs sitting at God's right hand, is itself created, and is the sum and the centre of creation) so much better than (the usual word of general and indefinite comparison in our Epistle, whether of Christian with Jewish [ch. vii. 19, 22; viii. 6; ix. 23], heavenly with earthly [x. 34; xi. 16; xii. 24], eternal with temporal [xi. 35]: see also vi. 9; vii. 7; xi. 40. It is used only three times by St. Paul, and never [unless 1 Cor. xii. 31, in the received text, be counted] in this sense: but thirteen times in this Epistle) the angels (of God; the heavenly created beings; afterwards, ver. 14, called "ministering spirits." All attempts to evade this plain meaning are futile; and proceed on ignorance of the argument of our Epistle, and of the Jewish theology. But why should the angels be here brought in? and why should the superiority of the Incarnate Son of God to them be so insisted on and elaborated? Bleek gives a very insufficient reason, when he says that the mention of God's throne brought to the Writer's mind the angels who are the attendants there. The reason, as Ebrard remarks, lies far deeper. The whole Old Test. dispensation is related to the New Test. dispensation, as the angels to the Son. In the former, mankind, and Israel also, stands separated from God by sin: and angels, divine messengers [as in the expression "the angel of the covenant"], stand as mediators between man and God. And of these there is, so to speak, a chain of two links: viz., Moses, and the angel of the Lord. The first link is a mere man, who is raised above his fellow-men by his calling, by his office, the commission given to him,—and brought nearer to God; but he is a sinner as they are, and is in reality no more a partaker of the divine nature than they are. The second link is the angelic form in which God revealed Himself to his people, coming down to their capacity, like to man, without being man. So that Godhead and Manhood approximated to one another: a man was commissioned and enabled to hear God's words: God appeared in a form in which men might see Him: but the two found no point of contact; no real union of the Godhead and the Manhood took place. Whereas in the Son, God and the Manhood not only approximated, but became personally one. God no longer accommodates Himself to the capacities of men in an angelophany or theophany, but has revealed the fulness of his divine nature in the man Jesus,—in that He, who was the brightness of his glory, became man. The argument of the Writer necessarily then leads him to shew how both Mediators, the angel of the Old Test. covenant, and Moses, found their higher unity in Christ. First, he shews this of the angel or angels [for it was not always one individual angelic being, but various] by whom the first covenant was given: then of Moses, ch. iii. iv. This first portion is divided into two: vv. 4—14, in which he shews that the Son, as the eternal Son of God, is higher than the angels [see the connexion of this with the main argument below]: then, after an exhortation [ii. 1—4] founded on this, tending also to impress on us the superior holiness of the New Test. revelation, the second part [ii. 5—18] in which he shews that in the Son, the manhood also is exalted above the angels), in proportion as he hath inherited (as his own: the word being perhaps chosen in reference to the Old Test. prophecies, which promised it to Him: see below. The perfect is important, as denoting something belonging to His present and abiding state, not an event wholly past, as "sat down" above, indicating the first "setting himself down," though that word might also be used of a permanent state of session) a more distinguished (or, more excellent) name (to be taken in its proper sense, not understood to mean precedence or dignity; as ver. 5 shews: whence also we get an easy answer to the enquiry, what name is intended: viz. that of Son, in the peculiar and individual sense of the citation there. The angels themselves are called "sons of God," Job i. 6; ii. 1; xxxviii. 7: Dan. iii. 25, and Gen. vi. 2 [see Jude 6 note, and Introd. to Jude, § v. 11]: but the argument here is that the title "SON OF GOD" is bestowed on him individually, in a sense in which it never was conferred upon an angel. See as a parallel, Phil. ii. 9 ff. It must be remembered, as Delitzsch beautifully remarks, that the fulness of glory of the peculiar name of the Son of God is unattainable by human speech or thought: it is, Rev. xix. 12, "a name which none knoweth but Himself." And all the citations and appellations here are but fragmentary indications of portions of its glory; are but beams of light, which are united in it as in a central sun. Since when has Christ in this sense inherited this name? The answer must not be hastily made, as by some Commentators, that the term inherited implies the glorification of the humanity of Christ to that Sonship which He before had in virtue of his Deity. Evidently so partial a reference cannot be considered as exhausting the sense of the Writer. Nor again can we say that it was at the time of His incarnation, though the words of the angel in Luke i. 35, "That holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God," seem to favour such a reference: for it was especially at His incarnation, that He was made a little lower than the angels, ch. ii. 9. Rather would the sense seem to be, that the especial name of SON, belonging to Him not by ascription nor adoption, but by His very Being itself, has been ever, and is now, His: inherited by Him, "in that He is the very Son of God," as Chrysostom says: the Old Test. declarations being as it were portions of the instrument by which this inheritance is assured to Him, and by the citation of which it is proved. Observe that the having become better than the angels is not identical with the inheriting, but in proportion to it: the triumphant issue of his Mediation is consonant to the glorious Name, which is His by inheritance: but which, in the fulness of its present inconceivable glory [see above], has been put on and taken up by Him in the historical process of his mediatorial humiliation and triumph) than they. 5—13.] Proof from Scripture of this last declaration.

5.] For (substantiation of His having inherited a more exalted name than the angels) to whom of (among) the angels did He (God, the subject of vv. 1, 2; as the subsequent citation shews) ever say (this citation from Ps. ii. has brought up in recent German Commentators the whole question of the original reference of that Psalm, and of Old Test. citations in the New Test. altogether. These discussions will be found in Bleek, De Wette, and Ebrard. The latter is by far the deepest and most satisfactory: seeing, as he does, the furthest into the truth of the peculiar standing of the Hebrew people, and the Messianic import of the theocracy. Those who entirely or partially deny this latter, seem to me to be without adequate means of discussing the question. Ebrard's view is, that the Psalm belongs to the reign of David. The objection that ver. 6 will not apply to David's anointing, inasmuch as that took place at Bethlehem in his boyhood, he answers, by regarding that anointing as connected with his establishment on Mount Zion, not as having locally taken place there, but as the first of that series of divine mercies of which that other was the completion. He further ascribes the Psalm to that portion of David's reign when (2 Sam. viii.) Hadadezer, and many neighbouring nations, were smitten by him: which victories he looked on as the fulfilment to him of Nathan's prophecy, 2 Sam. vii. 8—17. In that prophecy the offspring of David is mentioned in the very words quoted below in this verse, and in terms which, he contends, will not apply to Solomon, but must be referred to the great promised Seed of David. He regards this triumphant occasion as having been treated by the royal Psalmist as a type and foretaste of the ultimate ideal dominion of the "Son of David" over the kings of the earth), Thou (the seed of David, anointed in God's counsels as king on his holy hill of Zion: see above) art my Son (according to the promise presently to be quoted, finding its partial fulfilment in Solomon, but its only entire one in the Son of David who is also the Son of God), I (emphatic: "I and no other:" expressed also in the Hebrew) this day have begotten thee (first, what are we to understand by this term, have begotten? Bleek says, "As Sonship, in the proper sense, is dependent on the act of begetting, so may, especially by the Hebrews, 'to beget' be figuratively used to express the idea of 'making any one a son,' in which derived and figurative reference this also may be meant. And we get an additional confirmation of this meaning from Jer ii. 27, where it is said of the foolish idolatrous Israelites, 'They say to a stock, Thou art my father, and to a stone, Thou hast begotten me' (so the Septuagint). Accordingly, the meaning here is,—'I have made Thee my Son' [so Ps. lxxxix. 20, 26, 27: 'I have found David my servant; with my holy oil have I anointed him: . . . He shall cry unto me, Thou art my Father . . . Also I will make him my firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth'] :—namely, by setting Thee on the throne of my people : and the term this day will most naturally be referred to the time of the anointing of the King on Zion, as the act whereby he was manifested as Son of God in this sense." And so Calvin. The above remarks seem pertinent and unobjectionable, as long as we regard them as explaining the supposed immediate reference to David and present circumstances : but it is plain that, according to the above view of Ps. ii., and indeed to the usage of the New Test., in applying this passage to our Lord, we want another and a higher sense in which both the words, I have begotten, and this day, may be applicable to Him : a sense in which I should be disposed to say that the words must in their fulness of meaning be taken, to the neglect and almost the obliteration of that their supposed lower reference. For, granting the application of such sayings to our Lord, then must the terms of them, suggested by the Holy Spirit of prophecy, which is His testimony, bear adequate interpretations as regards His person and office. It has not therefore been without reason that the Fathers, and so many modern divines, have found in this term I have begotten the doctrine of the generation of the Son of God, and have endeavoured, in accordance with such reference, to assign a fitting sense to this day. As the subject is exceedingly important, and has been generally passed over slightly by our English expositors, I shall need no apology for gathering from Bleek and Suicer the opinions and testimonies concerning it. 1) One view refers this day to the eternal generation of the Son, and regards it as an expression of the everlasting present of eternity. Thus Origen very grandly says, "This is said to Him by God, with whom 'to-day' ever is present : for with God, as I think, is no evening, because neither is there morning, but the time which reaches, so to speak, over His unbegotten and eternal life, is an everlasting 'to-day,' in which the Son is begotten : no beginning of His being begotten being found, as neither of this 'to-day.'" And so Athanasius, Augustine, and other Fathers and moderns. 2) A second, to the generation, in time, of the Incarnate Son of Man, when Jesus assumed the divine nature on the side of his Manhood also : so Chrysostom, Theodoret, Eusebius, Cyril Alex., and others. 3) A third, to the period when Jesus was manifested to men as the Son of God, i.e. by most, to the time of the Resurrection, with reference to Acts xiii. 33, where St. Paul alleges this citation as thus applying [so, recently, Delitzsch] : by some, to that of the Ascension, when He was set at the right hand of God and entered on His heavenly High Priesthood [ch. v. 5] : so Hilary, Ambrose, Calvin, Grotius, and the Socinians. Owen also takes the same view ["the eternal generation of Christ, on which His filiation or sonship, both name and thing, doth depend, is to be taken only declaratively, and that declaration to be made in His resurrection, and exaltation over all, that ensued thereon"]. Of these interpretations, I agree with Bleek that the first is that which best agrees with the context. The former verses represent to us the Son of God as standing in this relation to the Father before the worlds : and ver. 6, which plainly forms a contrast to this ver. 5 as to time, treats distinctly of the period of the Incarnation. It is natural then to suppose that this verse is to be referred to a time prior to that event) ? And again (how is the ellipsis here to be supplied? Probably, and [to whom of the angels ever said He] again : or perhaps, again [see below on ver. 6] merely serves to introduce a fresh citation), I will be to Him as (for) a father, and he shall be to me as (for) a son (the citation is from the Septuagint, as usual. It occurs in the prophecy of Nathan to David respecting David's offspring who should come after him. The import of it has been above considered, and its connexion with Ps. ii. shown to be probable. The direct primary reference of the words to Solomon, 1 Chron. xxii. 7—10, does not in any way preclude the view which I have there taken of their finding their higher and only worthy fulfilment in the greater Son of David, who should build the only Temple in which God would really dwell) ? 6.] But (because a further proof, and a more decisive one as regards the angels, is about to be adduced) when He again (or, "when again He?") Does again introduce a new citation, or does it belong to the verb, and denote a new and second introduction? This latter view is taken by many, principally the ancient expositors, and lately by Tholuck, De Wette, Lüne-mann, and Delitzsch,—interpreting the ‘second introduction’ diversely: some, as His incarnation, contrasted with His everlasting generation, or His creating of the world, which they treat as His first introduction: others, as His resurrection, contrasted with His incarnation: others, to His second coming, as contrasted with His first. The other view supposes a transposition of the adverb again, which in the original stands between when and the verb. I have shewn in my Gr. Test. that such a transposition is without examples. In this Epistle, when “again” is joined to a verb, it always has the sense of ‘a second time’: e. g. ch. iv. 7; v. 12; vi. 1, 6. This being the case, I must agree with those who join again with hath introduced. And of the meanings which they assign to the phrase “bringing in again,” I conceive the only allowable one to be, the second coming of our Lord to judgment. See more below) hath (‘shall have.’ It appears from all usage that the present rendering, “bringeth in,” is quite inadmissible) hath introduced (in what sense? See some of the interpretations above. But even those who hold the transposition of the word again are not agreed as to the introduction here referred to. Some hold one of the above-mentioned meanings, some another. I have discussed the meaning fully below, and gathered that the word can only refer to the great entering of the Messiah on His kingdom. At present, the usage of the verb here used must be considered. It is the accustomed word in the Pentateuch for the ‘introducing’ the children of Israel into the land of promise, the putting them into possession of their promised inheritance: see also Ps. lxxviii. 54. We have it again in Neh. i. 9, of the second introduction, or restoration of Israel to the promised land. The prophets again use it of the ultimate restoration of Israel: compare Isa. xiv. 2; lvi. 7; Jer. iii. 14; Ezek. xxxiv. 13; xxxvi. 24; xxxvii. 21; Zech. viii. 8. This fact, connected with the circumstances to be noted below, makes it probable that the word here also has this solemn sense of ‘putting in possession of,’ as of an inheritance. The sense ordinarily given, of ‘bringing into the world,’ the act of the Father corresponding to the “coming into the world” [ch. x. 5] of the Son appears to be unexampled) the firstborn (only here is the Son of God so called absolutely. It is His title by præ-existence, “the firstborn of all creation,” Col. i. 15 [where see the word itself discussed]:—by prophecy, Ps. lxxxix. 27, “I will make Him my firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth”:—by birth, Luke ii. 7, see also Matt. i. 18–25:—by victory over death, Col. i. 18; Rev. i. 5:—and here, where He is absolutely the Firstborn, it will be reasonable to regard all these references as being accumulated—Him, who is the Firstborn,—of the universe, of the new manhood, of the risen dead. And thus the inducting Him in glory into His inheritance is clothed with even more solemnity. All angels, all men, are but the younger sons of God, compared to HIM, THE FIRSTBORN) into the world (not the same word as that so rendered, ch. x. 5: but signifying the ‘inhabited earth’: and very frequently used by the Septuagint in prophetic passages, where the future judgments of God on mankind are spoken of. The usage would not indeed be decisive against referring the words to Christ’s entrance into the human nature, but is much more naturally satisfied by the other interpretation), He (i. e. God, the subject of ver. 5) saith, And let all the angels of God worship Him (there are two places from which these words might come; and the comparison of the two will be very instructive as to the connexion and citation of prophecy. 1) The words themselves, including the and, which has no independent meaning here, come from Deut. xxxii. 43, where they conclude the dying song of Moses with a triumphant description of the victory of God over His enemies, and the avenging of His people. It will cause the intelligent student of Scripture no surprise to find such words cited directly of Christ, into whose hand all judgment is committed: however such Commentators as Stuart and De Wette may reject the idea of the citation being from thence, because no trace of a Messianic reference is there found. One would have imagined that the words “nor is there any that shall pluck them out of my hand," occurring just before, ver. 39 [compare John x. 28], would have prevented such an assertion. But those who see not Christ every where in the Old Testament, see Him nowhere. The fact of the usual literal citation of the Septuagint by our Writer, decides the point as far as the place is concerned from which the words are immediately taken. But here a difficulty arises. The words in the Septuagint, Deut. xxxii. 43, "Rejoice ye heavens, with Him, and let all the angels of God worship Him," do not exist in our present Hebrew text. It is hardly however probable, that they are an insertion of the Septuagint, found as they are [with one variation presently to be noticed] in nearly all the MSS. The translators probably found them in their Hebrew text, which, especially in the Pentateuch, appears to have been an older and purer recension than that which we now possess. 2) The other passage from which they might come is Ps. xvi. 7, where however they do not occur verbatim, but we read, "worship Him, all ye angels of God." This, especially the omission of the and, which clearly belongs to the citation, is against the supposition of their being taken from thence: but it does not therefore follow that the Psalm was not in the Sacred Writer's mind, or does not apply to the same glorious period of Messiah's triumph in its ultimate reference. Indeed the similarity of the two expressions of triumph is remarkable. 7.] And (with reference) indeed to the angels He (God) saith, Who maketh his angels winds (see below), and his ministers a flame of fire (the citation is after the Septuagint according to the Alexandrine MS., which indeed commonly agrees with the citations in this Epistle. And as the words stand in the Greek, the arrangement and rendering of them is unquestionably as above. But here comes in no small difficulty as to the sense of the original Hebrew. It is usually contended that its words can only mean, from the context, "who maketh the winds his messengers, and flames of fire his servants." But I have maintained in my Greek Test. that the sense is, "who maketh his messengers winds, his servants flames of fire," whatever these words may be intended to import. And this latter enquiry will I imagine be not very difficult to answer. He makes his messengers winds, i.e. He causes his messengers to act in or by means of the winds; his servants flames of fire, i.e. commissions them to assume the agency or form of flames for His purposes. It seems to me that this, the plain sense of the Hebrew as it stands, is quite as agreeable to the context as the other. And thus the Rabbis took it. The only accommodation of the original passage made by the Writer, is the very slight one of applying the general terms "His messengers" and "His servants" to the angels, which indeed can be their only meaning. The sense of the words I have endeavoured to give in some measure above. It is evident that the word represented in the A. V. by spirits, must be rendered winds, not 'spirits:' from both the context in the Psalm and the correspondence of the two clauses, and also from the nature of the subject. "They all are spirits," as asserted below, ver. 14: therefore it could not with any meaning be said, that He maketh them spirits). But unto the Son,—Thy throne, O God, [is] for ever and ever: and the rod (i.e. sceptre: see especially Esth. iv. 11; Amos i. 5, where the same Hebrew word occurs) of thy kingdom is the rod of straightness (i.e. righteousness, justice). Thou lovedst (the Writer refers the words to the whole life of our Lord on earth, as a past period) righteousness, and hatedst iniquity; for this cause (because of His love of righteousness and hatred of iniquity, shewn by his blameless life and perfect obedience on earth)

God (some render this first, "O God," but apparently without necessity), thy God, anointed thee (how? and when?) We must distinguish this anointing from what is said in Acts x. 38, "God anointed Him with the Holy Spirit, and with power," and the anointing of Isa. lxi. 1. For it is a consequent upon the righteous course of the Son of God in his Humanity, and therefore belongs to his triumph, in which He is exalted above his fellows [see below]. Again, the "oil of gladness" below seems rather to point to a festive and triumphant, than to an inaugurative unction. We should therefore rather take the allusion to be, as in Ps. xxiii. 5; xcii. 10, to the custom of anointing guests at feasts: so that, as the King in the Psalm is anointed with the oil of rejoicing above his fellows, because of his having loved righteousness and hated iniquity, so Christ, in the jubilant celebration of His finished course at his exaltation in heaven, is anointed with the festive oil above His fellows [see below]. There is of course an allusion also in the word anointed (echrîsen) to the honoured and triumphant Name Christ with oil of rejoicing (see above: oil indicative of joy, as it is of superabundance: compare Isa. lxi. 3) beyond thy fellows (i.e. in the Psalm, 'other kings:' hardly 'brothers by kin' [other sons of David], as Grotius and others. But to whom does the Writer apply the words? Chrysostom says, "Who are the fellows, except men? And the meaning is, Christ received not the Holy Spirit by measure." Theodoret on the Psalm, Calvin, Beza, and others, think of believers, the adopted into God's family: others, of the High Priests, prophets, and kings, in the Old Test., anointed as types of Christ: others, of all creatures: others, as in the Psalm, of other kings. Camero says, "Christ had in His office no fellows; in His human nature, all men; in grace, all the faithful." Still we may answer to all these, that they do not in any way satisfy the requirements of the context. Were it the intent of the Writer to shew Christ's superiority over his human brethren of every kind, we might accept one or other of these meanings: but as this is not his design, but to shew His superiority to the angels, we must I think take the word fellows as representing other heavenly beings, partakers in the same glorious and sinless state with Himself, though not in the strict sense, His "fellows." De Wette objects to this sense, that the Writer places the angels far beneath Christ: Delitzsch, that the angels are not anointed, whereas there is no necessity in the text for understanding that these fellows are also anointed: the comparison may consist in the very fact of the anointing itself:—and Ebrard, speaking as usual strongly, says that "neither the Psalmist, nor our author if in his senses, could have applied the word to the angels." But this need not frighten us: and we may well answer with Lünemann, 1) "that the general comparison here being that of Christ with the angels, the fresh introduction of this point of comparison in ver. 9 cannot of itself appear inappropriate. 2) Granted, that just before, in ver. 7, the angels are placed far beneath Christ,—we have this very inferiority here marked distinctly by the terms of this comparison. 3) The angels are next to Christ in rank, by the whole course of this argument: to whom then would the Writer more naturally apply the term fellows, than to them?" I may add, 4) that the comparison here is but analogous to that in ver. 4, of which indeed it is an expansion: and 5) that thus only can the figure of anointing at a triumphant festival be carried out consistently: that triumph having taken place on the exaltation of the Redeemer to the Father's right hand and throne [ver. 8], when, the whole of the heavenly company, His fellows in glory and joy, being anointed with the oil of gladness, His share and dignity was so much greater than theirs. It remains that we should consider the general import, and application here, of Ps. xlv. From what is elsewhere found in this commentary, it will not be for a moment supposed that I can give in to the view of such writers as De Wette and Hupfeld, who maintain that it was simply an ode to some king, uncertain whom, and has no further reference whatever. Granting that in its first meaning it was addressed to Solomon (for to him the circumstances introduced seem best to apply, e.g. the palace of ivory, ver. 9, compare 1 Kings x. 18: the gold from Ophir, ver. 10, compare 1 Kings ix. 28: the daughter of Tyre with her gift, ver. 13, compare 2 Chron. ii. 3—16), —or even, with Delitzsch, to Joram, on his marriage with the Tyrian Athaliah, —we must yet apply to it that manifest principle, without which every Hebrew ode is both unintelligible and preposterous, that the theocratic idea filled the mind of the Writer and prompted his pen: and that the Spirit of God used him as the means of testifying to that King, who stood veritably at the head of the theocracy in the divine counsels. Thus considered, such applications as this lose all their difficulty; and we cease to feel ourselves obliged in every case to enquire to whom and on what occasion the Psalm was probably first addressed. And even descending to the low and mere rationalistic ground taken by De Wette and Hupfeld, we are at least safer than they are, holding as we do a meaning in which both Jews and Christians have so long concurred, as against the infinite diversity of occasion and reference which divides their opinions of the Psalm).

10.] And (He saith to the Son: see a similar And introducing a new citation in Acts i. 20. The comma and capital letter, as in text, should be retained after this And), Thou, in the beginning, Lord (this has no word to represent it in the Hebrew. But it is taken up from “O my God” in ver. 24; and indeed from the whole strain of address, in which Jehovah has been thrice expressed; in vv. 1, 12, 15. On the bearing and interpretation of the Psalm, see below), foundedst the earth; and the heavens are works of thine hands (see Ps. viii. 3): 11.] they (seems most naturally to refer to the heavens immediately preceding. There is no reason in the Psalm why the pronoun should not represent both antecedents, the heavens and the earth. Here, however, the subsequent context seems to determine the application to be only to the heavens: for to them only can be referred the following image, “as a vesture shalt thou fold them up”) shall perish (as far as concerns their present state. Compare the parallel expression, “shall be changed,” below); but thou remainest (Bleek prefers the future, on the ground of the verbs being all future in the Hebrew text. But perhaps the consideration alleged by Lünemann, that the Writer, using only the Septuagint, seems to place “but thou remainest” and “but thou art the same,” as parallel clauses, is of more weight than the other. De Wette, on the Psalm, renders the Hebrew verbs present. The verb in the original is a compound one, giving the sense of endurance through all changes); and they all shall wax old as a garment (see Isa. li. 6, “The earth shall wax old like a garment,” also Isa. l. 9; and Eccles. xiv. 17); and as a mantle (the word signifies any enveloping, enwrapping garment) shalt thou fold them up (the Hebrew here, and apparently some copies of the Septuagint, have the same verb as below: “thou shalt change them,” —“thou shalt change them, and they shall be changed.” But the Alexandrine MS. reads as our text: and there can be little doubt that the Writer of this Epistle followed that text as usual), and they shall be changed (viz. as a mantle is folded up to be put away when a fresh one is about to be put on): but thou art the same (Hebrew, “and Thou art He,” viz., He, which thou hast ever been: compare Isa. xlv. 4), and thy years shall not fail (Hebrew, “Thy years end not,” are never completed. The account to be given of Psalm cii. seems to be as follows: according to its title it is “a prayer of the afflicted, when he is over- whelmed, and poureth out his complaint before the Lord." It was probably written during the Babylonian exile (compare vv. 14, 15) by one who "waited for the consolation of Israel." That consolation was to be found only in Israel's covenant God, and the Messiah Israel's deliverer. And the trust of Israel in this her Deliverer was ever directed to the comfort of her sons under the immediate trouble of the time, be that what it might. As generations went on, more and more was revealed of the Messiah's office and work, and the hearts of God's people entered deeper and deeper into the consolation to be derived from the hope of His coming. Here then we have this sorrowing one casting himself on the mercy of the great Deliverer, and extolling his faithfulness and firmness over, and as distinguished from, all the works of His hands. To apply then these words to the Redeemer, is to use them in their sense of strictest propriety).

13.] But (the contrast is again taken up from ver. 8) to whom of the angels hath He (God, as before) ever said, Sit thou on my right hand until I place thine enemies (as) a footstool (the allusion is to the custom of putting the feet on the necks of conquered enemies, see Josh. x. 24 f.) of thy feet? Hardly any Psalm is so often quoted in the New Test. with reference to Christ, as Ps. cx. And no Psalm more clearly finds its ultimate reference and completion only in Christ, as even those confess, who question its being immediately addressed to Him at first: and regard the argument of our Lord to the Pharisees founded on this place, as merely one grounded on concession on both sides. On the theocratic principle of interpretation, there is not the slightest difficulty in the application of the words directly to Him who is (and was ever regarded, even in David's time) Israel's King, the Head and Chief of the theocracy. And see this further carried out in the note on ch. v. 6.

to the word "ministers" in ver. 7. The word, signifying "pertaining to the ministry," is used in the Septuagint of any thing pertaining to the ministers or their service; the instruments, vessels, garments, or offerings for the ministry: here, of those devoted to or belonging to the ministry of God) spirits (unembodied beings, even as God Himself, but distinguished by the epithet presiding. The idea of "angels of service" or "of the ministry," is familiar to the rabbis), sent forth (it is the present participle, so also in Rev. v. 6; he does not mean that angels have before now, in insulated cases, been sent forth, but that they are ever thus being sent forth,—it is their normal work and regular duty through all the ages of time) for ministry (in order to the ministration which is their work. The A. V., "sent forth to minister for them," gives a wrong idea of the meaning. The ministry is not a waiting upon men, but a fulfilment of their office as ministers of God. See Rom. xiii. 4. Compare with this expression Col. i. 7, "a faithful minister of Christ on your behalf") on behalf of those who are about to inherit salvation (in the highest sense—eternal salvation: not, as Kuinoel and others, "deliverance from dangers:" in so solemn a reference, that meaning would be quite beside the purpose. Those spoken of are the elect of God, they who love Him, and for whom all things work together for good, even the principalities and powers in heavenly places. And if it be said, that the ministration of angels has often been used for other immediate purposes than the behoof of the elect, we may answer, that all those things may well come under the ministry, on account of them who shall be heirs of salvation: for all things are theirs; and for them, in and as united to Christ, all events are ordered)? Thus the Son of God is proved superior to the angels—i. e. to the highest of created beings: who, so far from being equal with Him, worship Him, and serve His purposes.

1.] On this account (viz. because Christ, the Mediator of the New Covenant, is far above all the angels who were the mediators of the former Covenant) it behoves us ("being aware of this difference," Theodoret: it is a moral necessity, arising from the previous premises: so Matt. xviii. 33; xxv. 27; 2 Tim. ii. 6. There is no stress on us) to give heed more abundantly (we must not understand after the comparative, more abundantly, "than we did to the law," as Chrysostom and others; or the aim of the Writer to be, to shew the superiority of the Gospel over the law, as Theodoret: but the comparative intimates how much our attention ought to be increased and intensified by our apprehension of the dignity of Him whose record the gospel is, and who is its Mediator) to the things heard [by us], lest haply we be diverted (Aristotle uses the same passive form of this Greek verb to indicate that which we familiarly call food going the wrong way in course of swallowing. Plutarch uses it of a ring falling off from the finger. See other illustrations in my Greek Test. The meaning of the verb seems then to be clear—to flow past, or away, or aside, to fall off, deflect from a course. We, going onward in time, living our lives in one or another direction, are exhorted 'to adhere to the things we have heard' [see above], and that, 'that we do not at any time float past them,' be not carried away beside them, led astray from the course on which they would take us. Two mistakes respecting the word are to be avoided: a) that of A. V., 'lest at any time we should let them slip.' From what has been above said of the tense and voice, it will be clear that such cannot be the meaning. b) Still worse is that of those who have thought of a comparison with a sieve, or a leaking vessel. So Calvin, Owen, and others: and I find it reproduced in Tait's commentary on the Hebrews: "lest . . . we should run out as leaking vessels." The meaning is as untenable, as the simile is irrelevant. The Greek expositors, whose authority in matters of Greek verbal usage is considerable, all explain it as above. So also all the more accurate of the moderns) from them (such is the most natural object to supply after the verb: turned aside from and floated away from the course on which the adhering to them would have carried us).

2.] For (introduces an argument [vv. 2—4] from the less to the greater. The law was introduced by the mere subordinate messengers of God, but was enforced with strict precision: how much more shall they be punished who reject that Gospel, which was brought in by the Son of God Himself, and continues to be confirmed to us by God's present power) if the word which was spoken by means of angels (i. e. the law of Moses. The co-operation of angels in the giving of the law at Sinai was not merely a rabbinical notion, but is implied in both the Old and New Testaments. There can consequently be little doubt that the Writer, in mentioning the word spoken by angels, had reference to the law of Moses, and not, as some think, to the scattered messages which were, at different times in Old Testament history, delivered by angels. It has been sometimes supposed that the angels spoken of here are not angels, but merely human messengers. Chrysostom says, "Some think that Moses is pointed at: but not with justice: for the writer speaks of many angels." Bleek remarks that the Writer would hardly have used this argument of depreciating contrast, had he regarded the Law as given either to Moses or to the people by the direct ministry of the Son of God Himself) was made ("became," on being thus spoken by angels) binding (firm, ratified: "stedfast," as A. V.: as applied to commands, —imperative,—not to be violated with impunity), and every transgression (overstepping of its ordinances, or more properly walking alongside of, and therefore not in, the path which it marked out) and disobedience (the relation of these two words to one another in point of sense seems accordingly to be, that transgression denotes the outward act of transgression of the Law, the practical withstanding of its precepts, while disobedience occurs when we fulfil not, and have no mind to fulfil, the precepts of the Law: the former expresses, viewed from without, more something positive, the latter something negative, while at the same time it regards more the disposition of the man. Still, the distinction, as regards the moral region here treated of, is not of such a kind that each transgression may not also be treated as a disobedience, and each disobedience include or induce a transgression. Bleek) received just recompence of reward (this term is used only in this Epistle, and every where else in a good sense. To what does the Writer refer? To the single instances of punishment which overtook the offenders against the law, or, as Grotius suggests, to the general punishment of the whole people's unbelief, as in ch. iii. 8; iv. 11; xii. 21, and see 1 Cor. x. 6 ff. ? I should be disposed to think, to the former: such penalties as are denounced in Deut. xxxii. 35, and indeed attached to very many of the Mosaic enactments: as Owen: "The law was so established, that the transgression of it, so as to disannul the terms and conditions of it, had by divine constitution the punishment of death temporal, or excommunication, appointed unto it");

3.] how shall we (emphatic: including Christians in general, all who have received the message of salvation in the manner specified below) escape, if we have neglected so great ("that was a giving of laws only, but the other brought the grace of the Spirit, and the taking away of sins, and the announcement of the kingdom of heaven, and the promise of immortality: so that he had some reason to say so great." Theodore of Mopsuestia) salvation (as in ch. i. 14); the which (equivalent to 'seeing that it'), having begun to be spoken by means of (he was the instrument in this case, as the angels in the other; but both, law and gospel, came at first hand not from the mediators, but from God) the Lord (by the Lord is to be joined with the whole, having begun to be spoken, not with spoken only. The Lord, as Bleek remarks, has here an especial emphasis setting forth the majesty and sovereignty of Christ: "He Himself, the Master of angels, first brought to us the doctrine of salvation," Theodoret), was confirmed (see Mark xvi. 19, where the word is used exactly in the same sense and reference. It seems to be used to correspond to became binding (or firm, the cognate adjective to this verb confirmed) above, signifying a ratification of the Gospel somewhat correspondent to that there predicated of the law: as also spoken here answers to spoken there) unto us by those who heard (it! or Him! In the sense, the difference will be but little: in either case, those pointed at will be, as Theodoret, "those who were partakers of the apostolic grace?" the "eye-witnesses, and ministers of the word" of Luke i. 2. From the usage, however, of the Writer himself, I prefer understanding "it:" compare ch. iii. 16; iv. 2; xii. 19) it (on the evidence furnished by this verse as to the Writer of the Epistle, see Introduction, § i. parr. 130 ff.); God also bearing witness to it (Chrysostom remarks: "How then was it confirmed? What if those who heard it, themselves feigned it? To remove the shame of this, and to shew that the grace came not from men, he adds that God also bore witness. For had they been the inventors, God would not have borne witness to them: but now they are witnesses, and God is witness besides. We have not simply believed them, but have been helped by signs and wonders: so that we have not believed them, but God Himself"), with signs and wonders (Bleek remarks: "As regards the relation of the two expressions to each other in their combination here, as divine confirmations of human testimony, it is this: a sign is a more general and wider idea than a wonder. Every sign, religiously considered, is also a wonder, but not always vice versa. A wonder always includes the idea of something marvellous, something extraordinary in itself, betokens something which by its very occurrence raises astonishment, and cannot be explained from the known laws of nature. On the other hand, a sign is each and every thing whereby a person, or a saying and assertion, is witnessed to as true, and made manifest: and thus it may be something, which, considered in and of itself, would appear an ordinary matter, causing no astonishment, but which gets its character of striking and supernatural from the connexion into which it is brought with something else, e. g. from a heavenly messenger having previously referred to some event which he could not have foreseen by mere natural knowledge. But it may also be a wonder, properly so called. Still, it is natural to suppose that the biblical writers, using so often as they do the words together, did not on every occasion bear in mind the distinction, but under the former word thought also of events which of themselves would be extraordinary and marvellous appearances"), and various miraculous powers, and distributions (this substantive is that derived from the verb used in Rom. xii. 3; 1 Cor. vii. 17; 2 Cor. x. 13) of the Holy Spirit (is this genitive descriptive of the object distributed, or of the subject distributing? It does not follow that this will be ruled by the reference of the possessive pronoun His below. It seems much more natural to refer this pronoun to God, the primary subject of the sentence, than to the Holy Spirit, who is merely introduced in the course of it. And if it be once granted that His refers to God, we should have, on the supposition of the subjective genitive, an awkwardly complicated sense, hardly consistent with the assertion of absolute sovereignty so prominently made in the following clause. I take then the genitive, with most commentators, as objective, and the Holy Spirit as that which is distributed, according to God's will, to each man according to his measure and kind. The declaration in John iii. 34, of Him whom God sent, "He giveth not the Spirit by measure," speaks of the same giving, but of its unmeasured fulness, as imparted to our glorious Head, not of its fragmentary distribution to us, the imperfect and limited members), according to His (God's: see above) will (it is best to refer this clause, not to the whole sentence preceding, nor to the two clauses, various miraculous powers and distributions of the Holy Spirit, as Bleek and Lünemann, but to the last of these only, agreeably to 1 Cor. xii. 11, and to the free and sovereign agency implied in the word distributions. See on the whole sense, Acts v. 32)!

5—18.] The dogmatic argument now proceeds. The new world is subjected, by the testimony of the Scriptures, not to angels, but to Christ: who however, though Lord of all, was made inferior to the angels, that He might die for, and suffer with, being made like, the children of men. 5.] The proposition stated. For (the connexion is with the sentence immediately preceding, i. e. with vv. 2—4. That former word was spoken by angels: it carried its punishment for neglect of it: much more shall this salvation, spoken by . . . &c., confirmed by . . . &c. For this whole state of things, induced by the proclamation of that salvation, is not subjected to angels, but to Christ, the Son of God. Then the fact that it is to MAN, and to Him AS MAN, that it is subjected, is brought in, and a new subject thus grafted on the old one of His superiority to the angels) not to angels ("angels" stands in the place of emphasis, as contrasted with "man" below) did he subject (viz., at the date of His arrangement and laying out of the same. The subjection of this present natural world to the holy angels, as its administrators, is in several places attested in Scripture, and was a very general matter of belief among the Jews. In Deut. xxxii. 8, we read in the Septuagint, "When the Highest distributed nations, as He dispersed the sons of men, He set the boundaries of nations according to the number of the angels of God." There, it is true, the Hebrew text has, as A. V., "according to the number of the children [more properly, the sons, in the stricter sense] of Israel." Origen (or his translator) says, "According to the number of His angels, or, as we read in other copies, according to the number of the sons of Israel." But the doctrine rests on passages about which there can be no such doubt. See Dan. x. 13, 20, 21; xii. 1, for this committal of kingdoms to the superintendence of angels: Rev. ix. 11; xvi. 5, for the same as regards the natural elements: Matt. xviii. 10, as regards the guardianship of individuals: Rev. i. 20 &c., for that of churches [for so, and not of chief bishops, is the name to be understood: see note there]. See also Dan. iv. 13. In the apocryphal and rabbinical writings we find the same idea asserted, and indeed carried out into minute details. So in Eccles. xvii. 17, "In the division of the nations of the whole earth he set a ruler over every people: but Israel is the Lord's portion." The rabbinical authorities may be found in Bleek and Eisenmenger. See also a very elaborate article—"Engel"—by Böhme, in Herzog's Encyclopædie: and testimonies to the view of the early church from Eusebius, Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Athenagoras, and Clement of Alexandria, in Whitby's note. The idea then of subjection of the world to angels was one with which the readers of this Epistle were familiar) the world to come (the reference of this expression has been variously given by expositors. 1) Many imagine it to refer to the world which is, strictly speaking, to come, as distinguished from this present world. This meaning will hardly tally with the context here. Though it might be said that the future life, being the completion of the state of salvation by Christ, might very well here be spoken of as the subject of the present discourse. 2) Some have supposed a direct allusion to ch. i. 6. But certainly in this case the verb would have been past: "of which we spoke;" and besides, the addition of the epithet to come sufficiently distinguishes it from the mere inhabited world, in the other place. 3) Others again have thought of heaven, which is to us future, because we are not yet admitted to its joys. But this again would not agree with the context. 4) The most probable account to be given is that the phrase represents the Hebrew expression, "the age to come" [see note on ch. i. 1], and imports the whole new order of things brought in by Christ,—taking its rise in His life on earth, and having its completion in His reign in glory. This last-mentioned view is by far the best, agreeing as it does with the connexion, for he has been speaking of the gospel above, with the ordinary way of speaking, and with the whole subject of the Epistle.

All reference to the future need not be excluded: we Christians are so eminently "prisoners of hope," that the very mention of such a designation would naturally awaken a thought of the glories to come: but this reference must not be pressed as having any prominence, of which we are speaking (which forms the subject of our present argument: viz. that urged in vv. 1—4. The sense is strictly present; not past, nor future. Bleek has here some excellent remarks: "As regards the whole thought, the non-subjection of the new order of the world to angels, it respects partly what is already present, partly what we have yet to wait for. Certainly, here and there in the New Test. history angels are mentioned: but they come in only as transitory appearances, to announce or to execute some matter which is specially entrusted to them: they never appear as essential agents in the introduction of the kingdom of God, either in general, or in particular: they do not descend on earth as preaching repentance, or preparing men to be received into God's kingdom. This is done by men, first and chiefly by Him who is Son of Man par excellence, and after Him by the disciples whom He prepared for the work. Even the miraculous conversion of Paul is brought about, not by angels, but by the appearing of the Lord Himself. Our author has indeed, in ch. i. 14, designated the angels as fellow-workers in the salvation of men: but only in a serving capacity, never as working or imparting salvation by independent agency, as does the Son of Man in the first place, and then in a certain degree His disciples also. So that we cannot speak with any truth of a subjection of this new order of things to the angels. Rather, even by what we see at present, does it appear to be subjected to the Redeemer Himself. And this will ever more and more be the case; for,—according to the prophetic declaration of the Psalm, the whole world shall be put under His feet [ver. 8]. Thus, by reminding them of the will of God declared in the holy Scriptures, does the Writer meet at the same time the objections of those of his readers and countrymen, to whom perhaps this withdrawal of the agency of the angels with the introduction and growing realization of the new order of things might appear an important defect").

6.] But (introduces a contrast to a preceding negative sentence frequently in our Epistle: compare ch. iv. 13. 15; ix. 12; x. 27; xii. 13. An ellipsis follows it, to be supplied in the thought, "it is far otherwise, for" . . .) one somewhere (no inference can be drawn from this indefinite manner of citation, either that the writer was quoting from memory, as some think, or that he did not know who was the author of the Psalm, as others. Rather may we say that it shews he was writing for readers familiar with the Scriptures, and from whom it might well be expected that they would recognize the citation without further specification. He certainly is not quoting from memory, seeing that the words agree exactly with the Septuagint: and Ps. viii. both in the Hebrew and Septuagint has a superscription indicating that it was written by David. We can hardly infer with some that the Writer meant to express his feeling that the Old Test. books had no human authors, but God Himself: for in this case the personal designation some one would hardly have been used, but a passive construction, "it is written," or the like, adopted instead) testified, saying (this seems the proper place for a few remarks on the sense of the citation which follows, and on the connexion of thought in the rest of the chapter. The general import of the eighth Psalm may be described as being, to praise Jehovah for His glory and majesty, and His merciful dealing with and exaltation of mankind. All exposition which loses sight of this general import, and attempts to force the Psalm into a direct and exclusive prophecy of the personal Messiah, goes to conceal its true prophetic sense, and to obscure the force and beauty of its reference to Him. This has been done by Bleek and others, who have made "the Son of Man" a direct title here of Christ. It is MAN who in the Psalm is spoken of, in the common and most general sense: the care taken by God of Him, the lordship given to him, the subjection of God's works to him. This high dignity he lost, but this high dignity he has regained, and possesses potentially in all its fulness and glory, restored, and for ever secured to him. How? and by whom? By one of his own race, the MAN Christ Jesus. Whatever high and glorious things can be said of man, belong of proper right to Him only, in proper person to Him only, but derivatively to us His brethren and members. And this is the great key to the interpretation of all such sayings as these: whatever belongs to man by the constitution of his nature, belongs superlatively to that MAN, who is the constituted HEAD of man's nature, the second Adam, who has more than recovered all that the first Adam lost. To those who clearly apprehend and firmly hold this fundamental doctrine of Christianity, the interpretation of ancient prophecy, and the New Test. application of Old Test. sayings to Christ, become a far simpler matter than they ever can be to others. And so here, it is to MAN, not to angels, that the "world to come" is subjected. This is the argument: and, as far as the end of ver. 8, it is carried on with reference to man, properly so called. There is here as yet no personal reference to our Lord, who is first introduced, and that in His lower personal human Name, at ver. 9. This has been missed, and thus confusion introduced into the argument, by the majority of Commentators. To hold that our Lord is from the first intended by "man" and "the son of man" here, is to disturb altogether the logical sequence, which runs thus: "It is not to angels that He has subjected the latter dispensation, but to man. Still we do not see man in possession of this sovereignty. No; but we do see Jesus, whose humiliation fulfilled the conditions of manhood, crowned with glory and honour, and thus constituted the Head of our race, so that His death and sufferings were our deliverance and our perfecting. And for this to be so, the sanctifier and the sanctified must be all of one race." And the rest of the chapter is spent in laying forth with inimitable beauty and tenderness the necessity and effect of Jesus being thus made like us. The whole process of this second chapter stands without parallel for tender persuasiveness amidst the strictest logical coherence. And yet both of these are concealed and spoiled, unless we take these words of the Psalm, and the argument founded on them, of man generally, and then, and not till then, of Jesus, as man like ourselves). What is man (some have understood this to mean, "How great, how noble, is man; who even amongst the immensity of all these heavenly works of God, yet is remembered and visited of Him;" but against this are the two words here used in the Hebrew, both betokening man on his lower side, of weakness and inferiority. There can be little doubt that the ordinary view is right—not how great, but how little, is man. This agrees far better also with the wonder expressed at God's thinking of and visiting him, below), that thou art mindful of him (i. e. objectively,—as shewn by Thy care of him)? or (in the Hebrew "and" is here doubtless substituted for or by the Septuagint, to indicate that the second member of the parallelism does not point to another subject additional to the first) the son of man (proceeding on the same view as that given above, it would be irrelevant here to enter on an enquiry as to the application of this title to our Lord, by others, and by Himself,—inasmuch as it is not here appropriated to Him, but used of any and every son of Adam. It is true, our thoughts at once recur to Him on reading the words—but, if we are following the train of thought, only as their ulterior, not as their immediate, reference), that Thou visitest him?

7.] Thou madest Him a little lower than the angels (literally, in the Hebrew, "Thou lettest him be little inferior to God." The best Hebrew scholars seem to agree that the word "God" here represents not the personal God, but the abstract qualities of Godhead, in which all that is divine, or immediately connected with the Deity, is included. If so, then the rendering of the Septuagint and our text is, though not exhaustive of the original, yet by no means an inaccurate one. The angelic nature, being the lowest of that which is divine and heavenly, marks well the terminus just beneath which man is set. And it must be remarked that the stress of the argument here is not on this mention of the angels, but on the assertion of the sovereignty of man. I may remark, that the marginal rendering of our A. V., "a little while inferior to," though doubtless also warranted by the usage of the Greek, seems quite unnecessary in the context, where not the question of time, but that of place, is before us); thou crownedst him with glory and honour (I must remind the reader of what has been said before; that the quotation is adduced here not of the Messiah, but of man, and that on this the whole subsequent argument depends. With this view vanish the difficulties which have been raised about the original and here-intended meaning of this clause. It is, in fact, a further setting forth of the preceding one. Man, who was left not far behind the divine attributes themselves, was also invested with kingly majesty on earth, put into the place of God Himself in sovereignty over the world. That this has only been realized in the man Christ Jesus, is not brought out till below, and forms the central point of the argument. Hupfeld remarks that the Hebrew term here rendered glory and honour, is a common expression for the divine majesty, and thence for the kingly, as a reflexion of the divine: and the crowning represents the kingly majesty, with which man is adorned as with a kingly crown): 8.] thou didst put all things under his feet (universal dominion is bestowed on man by his constitution as he came from God. That that bestowal has never yet been realized, is the next step of the argument: the Redeemer being at present kept out of sight, but by and by to be introduced as the real fulfiller of this high destiny of man, and on that account, incarnate in man's nature).

he put all things in subjection to him, he left nothing that is not put in subjection to him. But now <sup>n</sup> we see not yet all things put in subjection to him. <sup>9</sup> But him <sup>o</sup> that is made a little lower than the angels, even Jesus, we behold, on account of his suffering of death, <sup>p</sup> crowned under his feet. For in that he put all in subjection under him, he left nothing that is not put under him. But now we see not yet all things put under him. <sup>9</sup> But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death,

For (this for grounds, or rather begins to ground that already asserted in ver. 5) in that he (viz. God; not, the writer of the Psalm: unless indeed we are to understand "put in subjection" to mean saying that such is the case, as St. Paul expresses it, 1 Cor. xv. 27: but the other is much simpler, more analogous to usage, and more in the sense of the Psalm, which is a direct address to God) put all things (the universe: in the original, not merely all things as before, but the sum of all) under him (Man, again: not, Christ: see above, and remarks at the end of the verse), He left nothing ("he seems to except neither celestial nor terrestrial," Primasius. Possibly: and in the application itself, certainly: but we can hardly say that such was his thought here. The idea that angels are especially here intended, has arisen from that misconception of the connexion, which I have been throughout endeavouring to meet) unsubjected to him. But (contrast bringing out the exception) now (in the present condition of things: not strictly temporal, but as "now" ch. xi. 16, and ch. ix. 26) we see not yet (compare on the whole, 1 Cor. xv. 24—27) all things (the universe again) put under him (the word him in all three places referring to MAN: man has not yet attained his sovereignty. That the summing up of manhood in Christ is in the Writer's mind, is evident throughout, and that he wishes it to be before his readers' minds also; but the gradual introduction of the humiliation and exaltation of Christ in His humanity is marred by making all this apply personally to Him. Manhood, as such, is exalted to glory and honour, and waiting for its primeval prerogative to be fully assured, but it is IN CHRIST, and in Him alone, that this is true: and in Him it is true, inasmuch as He, being of our flesh and blood, and having been Himself made perfect by sufferings, and calling us His brethren, can lead us up through sufferings into glory, freed from guilt by His sacrifice for our sins).

9.] We do not see man, &c. But (strong contrast again: "but rather"—see on ver. 6) him who is made (better than 'was,' or 'hath been, made;') His humanity in its abstract position being in view) a little (not necessarily, here either, of time [a little while]: nor are we at liberty to assume such a rendering: though of course it is difficult to say, when the same phrase has two analogous meanings both applicable, as this, how far the one may have accompanied the other in the Writer's mind) lower than (the) angels, we behold (notice the difference between the half-involuntary words "we see" above, the impression which our eyes receive from things around us,—and the direction and intention of the contemplating eye [here, of faith: ch. iii. 19; x. 25] in this word, we behold, (namely) Jesus, on account of his suffering of death (it has been much doubted whether these words belong (I.) to the foregoing clause, "made a little lower than the angels," or, (II.) to the following, "crowned with glory and honour." The former connexion is assumed without remark by the ancient Commentators, and by several moderns. And these interpret the words two ways: 1) on account of the suffering of death [i.e. because He has suffered death],—thus making "a little (while)" refer to the time of His sufferings and death, or, as Chrysostom and others, to the three days of His being in the grave: 2) for the sake of the suffering of death,—so that He might suffer death. So Augustine and most of the ancients. But (II.) the latter connexion, with the following clause, is adopted by Theophylact, Luther, Calvin, and many others. The arrangement of the words, and the requirements of the context, on account of the suffering of death, both seem to require the latter, not the former connexion. The words are emphatic; they are taken up again in the next sentence by 'made perfect by sufferings' [which words themselves are a witness that suffering and exaltation, not suffering and degradation, are here connected]. But emphatic they could not be in the former connexion, coming as they would only as an explicatory clause, after "made a little lower than the angels." Again, the latter connexion entirely satisfies the context, the sufferings of Christ being treated of as necessary to His being our perfect Redeemer. And this connexion will be made even clearer by what will be said on the next clause), crowned with glory and honour (viz. at His exaltation, when God exalted Him to His right Hand: not, as some, at His incarnation, or His establishment as Saviour of the world: see above, ver. 7); in order that (how is this logically constructed? It depends on the last clause, which clause it will be best to take in its entirety, "on account of His suffering of death crowned with glory and honour." The full connexion we cannot enter into, till the three other questions arising out of our clause are disposed of: by the grace of God,—for every man,—and, that He should taste death) by the grace of God (how is this to be understood? At all events we have strong Scripture analogy for such an expression. In Gal. ii. 21, the Apostle's confession of faith in the Son of God, he says, "I do not make void the grace of God; for if righteousness be by the law, then Christ died without cause." And in Rom. v. 8, we read, "God giveth proof of His own love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." And in Titus ii. 11, "The grace of God was manifested, bringing salvation to all men." So that, in point of meaning, no difficulty need be found in the words. It was by the love and grace, the kindness and love towards men of the Father, that all Redemption was effected, and above all that One Sacrifice which was the crowning act of Redemption. The remarkable various reading (see margin) is discussed at length in the notes to my Greek Testament. I have there concluded, that it does not seem possible to assign to the words "except God," or, "without God," a meaning in accordance with the demands of the context, and the analogy of Scripture. This indeed would be no argument against a reading universally and unobjectionably attested by external authorities; but where no such attestation exists, may well be brought in to guide us to a decision) He might for ('on behalf of,' 'for the benefit of:' where this ordinary meaning of the preposition suffices, that of vicariousness must not be introduced. Sometimes, as e.g., 2 Cor. v. 15, it is necessary. But here clearly not, the whole argument proceeding not on the vicariousness of Christ's sacrifice, but on the benefits which we derive from His personal suffering for us in humanity; not on His substitution for us, but on His community with us) every man (in the original the word may be neuter or masculine; every thing, or every man. If the latter, to what is it to be referred? Origen and others take it as neuter, and apply it either to all nature, or to all reasonable beings. The latter see discussed below. The former can hardly be here meant: for of such a doctrine, however true, there is no hint. Then taking the adjective masculine, are we to understand it "for every one, angels included!" So Ebrard: but where do we find any such usage of "all," or "every," absolutely put as here? And where in this chapter again is any room for the position, that Christ suffered death for angels? In the logical course of the argument, we have done with them, and are now treating of man, and of Him who was made man to be our High Priest and advocate. And therefore of none other than man can this word "every one" be here meant, in accordance indeed with its universal usage elsewhere. If it be asked, why every man rather than all men, we may safely say, that the singular brings out, far more strongly than the plural would, the applicability of Christ's death to each individual man: and we may say that this again testifies to the sense "every man," as there would be no such reason for individualizing other rational beings, as there is for showing that the whole nature of man, to which this promise of sovereignty is given, is penetrated by the efficacy of (Christ's death) taste of death (some have seen in the phrase an allusion to the shortness and transitoriness of the Lord's death: so Chrysostom, "He properly said should taste death, and not, should die. For as if really only tasting it, He made so little stay in it, and immediately arose:" then, comparing Christ to a physician who first tastes his medicines to encourage the sick man to take them, adds, "So also Christ, since all men had ever been afraid of death, to persuade them to be bold against it, Himself tasted it, having no benefit so to do." So also many other Commentators, among whom Beza and Bengel find also the verity of His Death indicated in the words. But it is well answered, that in none of the places where the phrase appears, either in the New Test. or in the rabbinical writings, does any such meaning appear to be conveyed. Nor again can we, as Bleek, understand the implication to be that Christ underwent all the bitterness of death. But the phrase falls into exact accord with the general argument of the passage, that it became Christ, in order to be the great and merciful High Priest of humanity, to be perfected through human sufferings: and it forms in fact the first mention of this idea, and prepares the way for for which follows. I would say, that the word taste must be regarded as slightly emphatic, and as implying the personal undergoing of death and entering into its suffering. And I doubt much, whether it will not be found that in the other passages where the phrase occurs, this personal suffering of death, though not boldly prominent, is yet within view, and agreeable to the context.

And now, having considered the three points, by the grace of God,—for every man,—and taste of death,—we return again to the question of the connexion of in order that, with which this clause begins. We before stated that we find it dependent on the former clause, on account of His suffering of death crowned with glory and honour. This exaltation, being the perfecting [see ver. 10] of Christ, was arrived at through sufferings, and on account of His suffering of death,—both by means of, and on account of, His suffering of death. And this exaltation has made Him the divine Head of our humanity—the channel of grace, and the Captain of our salvation. Without His exaltation, his death would not have been effectual. Unless he had been crowned with glory and honour, received to the right hand of the Father, and set in expectation of all things being put under his feet, His death could not have been, for every man, the expiation to him of his own individual sin. On the triumphant issue of his sufferings, their efficacy depends. And this I believe is what the Sacred Writer meant to express. His glory was the consequence of his suffering of death;—arrived at through His suffering: but the applicability of His death to every man is the consequence of His constitution in Heaven as the great High Priest, in virtue of his blood carried into the holy place,—and the triumphant Head of our common humanity: which common humanity of Him and ourselves now becomes the subject of further elucidation).

10.] For (the connexion with the foregoing, see above. The for renders a reason why the result just introduced should have been one which the grace of God contemplated) it became (as matter not only of decorum, but of sequence from the data; —'was suitable to,' not as matter of absolute necessity, which was not the question here. The expression here glances at those who found in a suffering and crucified Messiah something unsuitable to the Godhead; and expresses not merely a negative, that it was not unsuitable, not unworthy of God,—but at the same time the positive, that it was altogether correspondent to and worthy of His Being and His Wisdom and His Love, to take this course: that it is so shaped, that he who knows the being and attributes of God, might have expected it. And thus it is indirectly implied, that it was also the most suitable, and that any other way would have been less correspondent to the being and purpose of God. Bleek has some excellent remarks on the lingering of the offence of the cross among these Jewish Christians, who, although their ideas of the glory and kingly triumph of the Messiah had been in a measure satisfied by the resurrection and exaltation of Christ, and their hopes awakened by the promise of future glory at His second coming,— yet, in the procrastination of this great event, felt their souls languishing, and the old stumbling-block of Christ's sufferings recurring to their minds. To set forth then the way of suffering and the cross as one worthy of God's high purpose, would be a natural course for the argument of the Writer (to take) Him, for whom are all things (not only, 'all those things which contribute to man's salvation,' but 'the sum total of things,' 'the universe,' as in the parallel passages. All created things are for God [see below], for His purpose and for His glory), and by whom (by whose will, and fiat, and agency) are all things (who is intended? From the sequel of the sentence there can be no doubt that it is God the Father. For the subject of this clause is there said to perfect Christ: and this could be predicated of none but the Father Himself. That these expressions are found frequently used of the Son, need be no objection: whatever is thus said of Him as the End, and the Worker, in creation may à fortiori be said of the Father who sent Him and of whose will He is the expression. As to the reason of this lengthened appellation here, Calvin well says: "He might have designated God in one word: but he wished to remind them that that was to be accounted best, which He decreed whose will and glory is the real end of all things." And not only this: in introducing the "becomingness" of Christ's sufferings by such a description of God, he reminds his readers that those sufferings also were for Him—contributing to His end and His glory—and by Him, brought about and carried through by His agency and superintendence), bringing (the application of the clause is to God the Father, the subject of the preceding. See the idea which refers it to Christ treated in my Greek Test. Some take the participle as past, "having brought," referring the expression chiefly, or entirely, to the Old Test. saints. These however can hardly be meant; for they cannot be said in any adequate sense to have been led to glory, or to have had Christ for the Captain of their salvation. And surely it would be most unnatural to refer the participle to those saints only who had entered into glory since the completion of Christ's work, but before this Epistle was written. The peculiar form of the participle here used has in all cases reference to the completion of the action. In Christ's being perfected, the bringing many sons to glory is completed. Had it been a present, we must have rendered, as indeed the A. V. has erroneously rendered now, 'in bringing;' so that the Father's perfecting of Christ would be only a step in the process of leading many sons to glory. But now it is the whole process. We cannot give in idiomatic English this delicate shade of meaning correctly: the nearest representation of it is, as in the text, perhaps—'it became Him . . . bringing, as He did, many sons to glory, to' &c.) many (not in contrast to all, but in contrast to few, and in relation to one) sons (probably in the closer sense: not merely sons by creation, but sons by adoption. This seems necessitated by the next verse) to glory (the expression is not common in this meaning in our Epistle: and is perhaps chosen on account of the word occurring in ver. 9. It is, that supreme bliss and majesty which rightly belongs to God only—of which His divine Son is [ch. i. 3] the brightness or shining forth, and of which believers in Christ are here in their degree partakers, and shall be fully so hereafter. It is the crowning positive result of the negative word salvation), to make perfect (this word is used often in our Epistle, and in various references. It is said of the Redeemer Himself, here, and in ch. v. 9; vii. 28,—of His people, who are made perfect through Him, ix. 9; xi. 14, 40; xii. 23; and indeed xii. 2;—with a general reference, vii. 11, 19; see also perfect, ch. v. 14; ix. 11,—and perfection, ch. vi. 1. From all this it is evident, that some meaning must be looked for wide enough to include all these senses of the word itself and its cognates. And such a sense is found in the ordinary rendering of the word,—to "accomplish," or "make complete," or "perfect." This accomplishment, completion or perfecting of Christ was, the bringing Him to that glory which was His proposed and destined end: and it answers to the "crowning with glory and honour" of ver. 9: and to the "glorifying" of St. John: and fits exactly the requirements of the other passages in our Epistle where our Lord is spoken of. Nor is such meaning at all misplaced in those passages where we are spoken of: seeing that it is a relative term, and our being made perfect is the being brought, each one of us, to the full height of our measure of perfection, in union with and participation of Christ's glory. Some have imagined that the meaning here and elsewhere in our Epistle, of the word rendered "to make perfect," is "to consecrate:" and understand the word of the setting apart or consecration of Christ to the high-priestly office. So Calvin [the first, as Bleek thinks, who propounded the view], Beza, and others. But Bleek replies well, that such a meaning will not suit the other passages in our Epistle, e. g. ch. vii. 11, 19: and besides, no such meaning is really ever found for the Greek word) the Author (Captain, in the A. V., introduces an idea foreign to the meaning of the title here used for our Lord. It is often found in the sense of a leader in the Septuagint: in that of the progenitor of a race: of one who precedes others by his example, they following him. Compare particularly ch. xii. 2, where the idea of author and completer is so closely allied to that in our verse, that the word author should have been kept here also. The idea of origination for the word frequently occurs in Greek writers, especially later ones, of the person from whom any thing, whether good or bad, first proceeds, in which others have a share. Hence the usage here, and in Acts iii. 15, where Christ is called "the Prince of Life," is easily explained: on Him our salvation depends; He was its originator) of their salvation through sufferings (i. e. His sufferings were the appointed access to, and the appointed elements of, His glory: see more particularly below, on ch. v. 8, 9. Chrysostom gives a beautiful general application: "shewing us that he who suffers for another, does not benefit him alone, but also himself becomes more illustrious and nearer perfection").

The connexion with the foregoing cannot be made plain, till we have discussed the meaning of of one below. It may suffice to say, that the assertion, and the quotations are subordinate to the words "many sons" in ver. 10.

11.] For both the Sanctifier and (notice both—and, which bind closely together in one category) the sanctified (sanctification is not here the same as "salvation," but as every where, when used in allusion to Christ's work on His people, involves that transforming and consecrating process, of which His Spirit is the actual agent. Hence, believers are ordinarily not described by the past participle, "having been sanctified," but as here by the present, "being sanctified." The word to sanctify signifies in the Septuagint and New Test. usually, to select out: and where their present state is spoken of, the participle is present: where God's purpose respecting them, and Christ's finished work, the perfect. Sanctification is glory working in embryo: glory is sanctification come to the birth and manifested.

It is disputed whether the reference of these words is to be considered as general, applying to every case of sanctifier and sanctified, as, e. g., the priest and the people under the old law, the firstfruits and the remaining harvest: or is to be restricted to Christ and His people alone. Certainly the latter seems to be required by the context, and most of all by the assumption of the subject in the next clause tacitly as contained in he that sanctifieth. The ground on which Christ is our Sanctifier has also been variously alleged. Grotius leaves the connexion very loose, when he says, "Christ makes us holy by His teaching and example. He was conceived by the Holy Spirit, and we by the Holy Spirit get a new nature: thus we both have a common origin." But this obviously does not reach the depth of the following argument, see especially ver. 17: and we must believe that there is a reference to the expiatory death of Christ: see also ch. x. 10, 14, and more in the note there) [are] of one (one, as will be seen by the reference in my Greek Test., must be taken as masculine. And if masculine, what are we to supply? Some say, Adam: others, Abraham. But it seems far better and simpler here, on account of the expression many sons, above, and as satisfying fully the force of of, or out of, to understand God to be meant. It is not here the mere physical unity of all men with Christ which is treated, but the further and higher spiritual unity of the Sanctifier and the sanctified, as evinced by his speaking of them. The same is plain from ver. 14 below : see there. See John viii. 47 ; 1 John iii. 10 ; iv. 6 ; v. 19 ; 3 John 11.

Note, that the point brought out here is not that the holiness of our Lord's human nature, and our holiness, are both of one, viz. the Father [John x. 36] : which, however true, would be introducing a matter not belonging to the argument here, all [of them] : on which account (viz. because they are all of one) He (Christ : see above) is not ashamed (His consent in this relationship springs, as Chrysostom says, not from the nature of the case merely, but from His extreme love and condescension) to call them (that are sanctified) brethren, saying, I will declare thy name unto my brethren, in the midst of the assembly will I sing of thee (it will be sufficient to refer, respecting the general sense and prophetic import of Ps. xxii., to what has been before said, on Ps. viii. [above ver. 6], and on similar citations elsewhere. The Psalm was originally the expression of a suffering saint, in all probability David, communing with his God : laying forth to Him his anguish and finally triumphing in confidence of His gracious help and deliverance. But by the mouth of such servants of God did the prophetic Spirit speak forth His intimations respecting the Redeemer to come. No word prompted by the Holy Ghost had reference to the utterer only. All Israel was a type : all spiritual Israel set forth the second Man, the quickening spirit : all the groanings of God's suffering people pre-figured, and found their fullest meaning in, His groans, who was the chief in suffering. The maxim cannot be too firmly held, nor too widely applied, that all the Old Test. utterances of the Spirit anticipate Christ, just as all His New Test. utterances set forth and expand Christ : that Christ is every where involved in the Old Test., as He is every where evolved in the New Test. And this Psalm holds an illustrious place among those which thus point onward to Christ. Its opening cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" was uttered by the Lord Himself in His last agony. The most minute particulars detailed in it are by the Evangelists adduced as exemplified in the history of His Passion ; see e.g. John xix. 24. And, as Bleek well observes, the particulars chosen out of that history by St. Matthew seem to have been selected with an especial view to the illustration and fulfilment of this Psalm. Elrard, in his note here, insists on the authorship of the Psalm by David, and on its date, as belonging to the time of his persecution by Saul. Then he maintains the exact parallelism of the circumstances with those of the second and greater David, and refers the "brethren" here to the countrymen of David, who were hereafter to be his subjects. I have no positive objection to this view. Subordinately to the deeper and wider one, it might be applicable in individual instances : but that other seems to me both safer and nearer the truth.

The particular verse here chosen, the 22nd, forms the transition-point from the suffering to the triumphant portion of the Psalm : and consequently the resolution expressed in it by the Messiah has reference to His triumphant state, in which he is still not ashamed to call his people brethren. It is characteristic of the object of this Epistle with reference to its intended readers, that whereas the Writer might have cited two instances as matters of fact, in which our Lord did call His disciples brethren after His resurrection [see John xx. 17 ; Matt. xxviii. 10], yet he has not done so, but has preferred to establish his point by the Old Test. citations.

13.] And again, I will put my trust in Him (there is considerable dispute as to the original place from which this citation comes. Most Commentators, and recently Bleek and Delitzsch, have believed it to be taken from Isa. viii. 17, where the words occur in the Septuagint, immediately preceding the next citation. The only objection to this view is, that it would be hardly likely in this case that the words "and again" would have occurred, but the two citations would have proceeded as one. And hence the words have been sought in other places: e. g. in Ps. xviii. 3, Isa. xlii. 1, where however, besides the Septuagint being different, the words are spoken in a totally different reference. The same words are found in the Septuagint in 2 Sam. xxii. 3, and Isa. xii. 2. There is no objection to the first of these passages being the origin of our citation; and the alleged non-Messianic character of the Psalm will weigh very light with those who view the Psalms as above set forth. Still, regarding the above-stated objection as of no weight,—owing to the diversity of the two cited clauses, the one expressive of personal trust in God, the other declaratory respecting a relation to others [compare also ch. x. 30, which is a nearly though not exactly similar case],—I prefer, as the more natural, the opinion which derives both texts from the same place of Isaiah. On the sense then, see below). And again, Behold I and the children which God gave me (Isa. viii. 18. Considerable difficulty has been made by the Commentators in applying these citations to Christ. I own that the question seems to me to be admirably stated by Theodoret on Ps. xxii., "More credit is to be given to the Holy Apostles and to our Saviour Himself when He uses plainly the opening of the Psalm, than to those who attempt to interpret it." But this does not preclude our entering on an attempt in each case to give a distinct account of the rationale of the application. In the passage of Isaiah [vv. 11—18], the Prophet is especially blaming the people of Judah under Ahaz, for having called in the help of the Assyrian king against Pekah king of Israel, and Rezin king of Syria. And in these verses [17 f.] the Prophet expresses his own determination, in spite of the reliance of the people on the confederacy, to wait for the Lord, and to remain, he and the children whom God had given him, for signs and wonders in Israel from the Lord of Hosts, which dwelleth in Zion. Then from Isa. viii. 18 to ix. 7, is set forth the prospect of future deliverance to Judah coming from their God, ending with the glorious anticipation of the great future Deliverer. This confident speech of the Prophet our Writer adopts at once as the words of the greatest of all Prophets—thereby assuming the prophetic office of Christ. Thus the matter illustrated [for there is no demonstration here; this verse is a consequence of the last] is, that as the prophet Isaiah withstood the human dependence of his age, and stood forth, he and the children whom God had given him, and who were begotten in pursuance of the divine command as a sign to Israel,—so the great Prophet himself fulfilled the same office, and had the same hopes, and bore the same relation to those among whom He prophesied, praising God with them, leading them in confidence on God, and speaking of them as one family and stock with Himself. So that our passage forms a notable instance of the prophetic office of Christ being taken as the antitype of the official words and acts of all the Prophets, just as His kingly office fulfils and takes up all that is said and done by the theocratic Kings, and His priestly office accomplishes all the types and ordinances of the Old Test. Priesthood). 14.] The connexion and line of argument is this: in ver. 5 it was shewn, that not to angels, but to MAN, is the new order of things subjected: in vv. 6—8, that this domination was predicated of man in the Old Test.: in ver. 9, that the only case of its fulfilment has been that of Jesus, who has been crowned with glory and honour on account of His suffering death. Then, vv. 10, 11 a, it is shewn that the becoming way for the Redeemer to this crown of glory, the purpose of winning which was to bring many sons of God to it, was, being perfected through sufferings, seeing that He must share with those whom He is to sanctify, in dependence on a common Father. Then vv. 11 b, 12, 13 have furnished illustrations confirmatory of this, from His own sayings in the Scripture. And now we are come to the proof, that He who was thus to be the Leader of the salvation of these many sons, by trusting like them, and suffering like them, must Himself BECOME MAN like them, in order for that His death to have any efficacy towards His purpose. Since then (by since an inference is drawn from the words immediately preceding: by then, the thought is cast back to the argument of which the citations had been an interruption: as if it had been said, "and by this very expression in our last citation, the children, we may substantiate that which our argument is seeking to prove") the children (before mentioned) are partakers of (literally, 'have been constituted partakers of;—in the order established in nature, and enduring still. The participation is not with their elders, as Valeknaer, but with one another) blood and flesh ("this expression betokens," says Bleek, "the whole sensuous corporeal nature of man, which he has in common with the brutes, and whereby he is the object of sensuous perception and corporeal impressions: whereby also he is subjected to the laws of the infirmity, decay, and transitoriness of material things, in contrast to purely spiritual and incorporeal beings." Delitzsch remarks on the order, that it differs from "flesh and blood," in setting forth first the inner and more important element, the blood, as the more immediate and principal vehicle of the soul, . . . before the more visible and palpable element, the flesh: doubtless with reference to the shedding of Blood, with a view to which the Saviour entered into community with our corporeal life), He Himself also in like manner (similarly). The word expresses a general similitude, a likeness in the main; and so is not to be pressed here, to extend to entire identity, nor on the other hand to imply, of purpose, partial diversity; but to be taken in its wide and open sense—that He Himself also partook, in the main, in like manner with us, of our nature. The ancient expositors dwell justly on the word as against the Docetar, who held that our Lord's was only an apparent body) participated in (the A. V., "took part," is good, but it should be followed by 'in,' not 'of,' which makes it ambiguous. Notice the past tense, referring to the one act of the Incarnation) the same things (viz. blood and flesh: not, as Bengel, "the same things which happen to his brethren, not even death excepted"); that by means of his death (a paradox.

"Death itself, as Death, is that which Jesus used as the instrument of annihilating the prince of Death;" Hoffmann. There is an old Latin Epigram, which may be thus given in English: "Had not the death of death | by death done death to death, | that key were lost, which Life | Eternal openeth") He might destroy (bring to nought. The word is found, besides here, once in St. Luke [xiii. 7], and twenty-five times in St. Paul) him that hath the power of death (the present participle is better taken of the office, 'the holder of the power,'—than of past time, 'him that had the power,' as A. V. The reason why this clause comes first, and not 'the devil,' is probably, as Chrysostom suggests, to exhibit the paradox mentioned above), that is, the devil (compare Wisdom ii. 24, "By the envy of the devil death came into the world:" and see Rev. xii. 9; xx. 2. So in the Rabbinical writings, Samael, the chief of the evil spirits, was called the angel of death: and it is said, "Samael was the cause of death to all the world."

The Death of Christ brought to nought the agency of the devil in death, because, that Death of His being not the penalty of His own sin, but the atoning sacrifice for the sin of the world, all those who by faith are united to Him can now look on death no longer as the penalty of sin, but only as the passage for them, as it was for Him, to a new and glorious life of triumph and blessedness. But for those who are not united to Him, death, retaining its character of a punishment for sin, retains also therewith all its manifold terrors); and might deliver those who (as many as. This does not in such a case imply the existence of others who do not fulfil the thing predicated, but rather takes, so to speak, the full measure of those indicated, being almost equivalent to "who, every one of them . . ." These persons whom Christ died to free, were all subject to this bondage induced by the fear of death. potential benefit of Christ's death extends) by fear of death were through all their lifetime subjects of (not merely 'subject to,' so that they might or might not be involved in it, but their actual implication is interred) bondage (Calvin's note is well worth transcribing: "This place admirably expresses how wretched is their life who dread death; as all must dread it who view it out of Christ; for then there appears in it nothing but a curse. For whence comes death except from the wrath of God against sin? Hence this bondage through life, i.e. perpetual anxiety, constraining their unhappy souls. For conscience of sin ever implies dread of divine judgment. From this fear Christ has liberated us, taken away our curse by submitting to it, which was the thing formidable in death").

16.] Explanatory of ver. 15, by pointing out a fact well known to us all, that it was to help a race subject to death, that Christ came. For, as we well know, it is not angels that He helpeth, but it is the seed of Abraham that He helpeth (I have rendered thus, to preserve the emphasis on the two contrasted words, angels, and the seed of Abraham. The word rendered helpeth signifies "takes by the hand," in order to assist and lead. This help is not by Him rendered to angels: He is not the Captain of their salvation. And herein there is no contradiction to Col. i. 20: for the reconciliation which Christ has effected even for the things in the heavens, is not delivering them from fear of death, or bringing them through sufferings to glory, whatever mystery it may involve beyond our power of conception.

the seed of Abraham next comes under consideration. And we must here as ever, render, and understand, according to the simple sense of the words used, regarding the circumstances under which they were used. Accordingly, we must not here understand mankind, as some have done: nor again with others, can we suppose the spiritual seed of Abraham to be meant [Gal. iii. 7, 29; Rom. iv. 11 f., 16],—because, as Bleek well remarks, the present context speaks

<sup>17</sup> Wherefore in all things it behoved him to be made not of that into which Christ has made those redeemed by Him, but of that out of which He has helped them. The seed of Abraham then means, the Jewish race, among whom Christ was born in the flesh, and whom He did come primarily to help: and the peculiarity of the expression must be explained, with Estius,—“This whole epistle prudently dissimulates the calling of the Gentiles, either because the mention of them would be displeasing to the Hebrews, or because that mention was not necessary to its design.” I must not omit to mention, that the above manner of interpreting this verse, now generally acquiesced in, was not that of the ancient expositors. By them it was generally supposed that the verb referred to our Lord's taking upon Him of our nature: and they for the most part make it into a past tense, and render as A. V.,—“He took not upon Him the nature of angels, but He took upon Him the seed of Abraham.” But independently of other reasons against this, arising from the usage of the word, the formula ‘to take on him the seed of Abraham, or the angels,’ would be a most unnatural way of expressing ‘to take the nature of either of these.’ And the ancients themselves seem to have felt, that this formula of itself could not bear such a meaning. They assume accordingly that the writer represents man and his nature, through sinfulness, alienated and flying from God and the divine nature, and the Son of God pursuing, overtaking, and drawing it into union with Himself. It needs little to shew how far-fetched and forced this interpretation of the words is, if it is intended to give the sense of assuming the nature of man. See more remarks on the meaning in my Greek Test.).

17.] Because then He had this work to do for the seed of Abraham (sons of men, in the wider reference),—viz. to deliver them from fear of death, He must be made like them in all things, that He may be a merciful and faithful High Priest. Then ver. 18 gives the reason of this necessity. Whence it behoved Him (not implying the eternal purpose of God [Luke xxiv.

26:—but a moral necessity in the carrying out of His mediatorial work) in all things (i. e. all things wherewith the present argument is concerned: all things which constitute real humanity, and introduce to its sufferings and temptations and sympathies. The exception, without sin, brought out in ch. iv. 15, is not in view here) to be like (not, ‘made like.’ The original expresses that this resemblance was brought about by a definite act, other than his former state: an important distinction, which however we must rather lose in the English than introduce an irrelevant idea by the word ‘made’) unto his brethren (the children of Israel, as above: but obviously also, his brethren in the flesh—all mankind), that he might become (become, not simply be, because the High Priesthood of Christ in all its fulness, and especially in its work of mercy and compassion and succour, was not inaugurated, till He entered into the heavenly place: see ch. v. 9, vi. 19, 20, vii. 26, viii. 1, 4. His being in all things like his brethren, sufferings and death included, was necessary for Him, in order to his becoming, through those sufferings and death, our High Priest. It was not the death [though that was of previous necessity, and therefore is often spoken of as involving the whole], but the bringing the blood into the holy place, in which the work of sacerdotal expiation consisted: see Levit. iv. 13—20: and below, on the end of the verse) a merciful (the original might also be rendered, ‘merciful, and a faithful High Priest?’ but against adopting this here, see in my Greek Test.) and faithful (true to His office, not only as regards God [ch. iii. 5], but as regards men also; to be trusted without fail) High Priest (this is the first mention of the sacerdotal office of Christ, of which so much is afterwards said in the Epistle, and which recurs again so soon, ch. iii. 1) in matters relating to God (the words must not be referred to faithful, but to High Priest; or rather to the whole idea, ‘a merciful and faithful High Priest’), to expiate the sins (the word used here means to be propitiated, and properly used passively of the person to be rendered propitious. The expression is not a strict one: but is thus to be accounted for: God is rendered propitious to the sinner, who has forfeited His favour and incurred His wrath. But we never find in Scripture, Old Test. or New Test., any such expression as “the Father was propitiated concerning our sins by the death of His Son;” or as this, “Christ propitiated God (or, ‘the wrath of God’) by His blood;” never, “God was reconciled to us.” As the Old Test. nowhere says, that sacrifice propitiated God’s wrath, lest it should be thought that sacrifice was an act, by which, as such, man influenced God to shew him grace,—so also the New Test. never says that the sacrifice of Christ propitiated God’s wrath, lest it may be thought that it was an act anticipatory of God’s gracious purpose,—which obtained, and so to speak, forced from God previously reluctant, without His own concurrence, grace instead of wrath.” Delitzsch. To understand this rightly, is all-important to any right holding of the doctrine of the Atonement. This then is not said: but the sinner is [improperly, as far as the use of the word is concerned] said on his part, to be propitiated, to be brought into God’s favour; and if the sinner, then that on account of which he is a sinner, viz. his sin. The word here is used of Him who, by His propitiation, brings the sinner into God’s favour, i. e. makes propitiation for, expiates, the sin. The Death of Christ being the necessary opening and condition of this propitiation,—the propitiation being once for all consummated by the sacrifice of His death, and all sin by that sacrifice expiated, we must of necessity determine [against the Socinian view of Christ’s High Priesthood, which will again and again come before us in this commentary] that His High Priesthood was, strictly speaking, begun, as its one chief work in substance was accomplished, here below, during His time of suffering. That it is still continued in heaven, and indeed finds its highest and noblest employ there, is no reason against this view. The high priest had accomplished his sacrifice, before he went

"Why did not he say, the sins of the world, but, of the people? because then the relation of the Lord was to the Jews only, and He came especially on their account, that their salvation might precede the salvation of the rest: notwithstanding that the converse really happened." Theophylact).

18.] Explanation, how the being like His brethren in all things has answered the end, that He might become a merciful and faithful High Priest. For He Himself having been tempted in that which He hath suffered, He is able to succour them that are (now) tempted (the construction is much doubted. The sentence is open to several logical arrangements and consequent renderings. 1) "for He is able to help those who are tried by the same temptations in which His own sufferings have consisted:" 2) "for having been Himself tempted in that which He hath suffered, &c.:" 3) "for in that which He hath suffered when He himself was tempted, He is able to succour those who are tempted [in the same]:" 4) "for in that in which He himself was tempted and hath suffered He is able, &c." Of these I much prefer 2); because (a) it keeps together the prominent members of the logical comparison, between Him being tempted and us being tempted, giving "in that which He hath suffered" as a qualification of being tempted, and thus explaining wherein His temptation consisted. Nor (b) is it at all open to Lünemann's objection, that it limits the power of Christ to help, to those things merely in which He himself has suffered and been tempted: stating as it does generally the fact being tempted, and then specifying in what, viz. in that which He hath suffered. It also (c) corresponds exactly in construction with the similar sentence ch. v. 8, — "He learned, from the things which He suffered, obedience," in supplying an object after suffered. And (d) it seems more natural that an object should be required after the perfect, than that it should be used absolutely. After 'He hath suffered,' we enquire, 'What?' — after 'He suffered,' — 'When?' Christ's whole sufferings were a temptation in the sense here intended: see ch. iv. 15; James i. 2. The rendering given in the A. V., making "in that" a conjunction of inference, meaning "because," seems to be quite unauthorized. The ability to succour here is not to be understood of the power to which the Lord has been exalted through death and suffering to be a Prince and a Saviour, — which is not here in question: but of the power of sympathy which he has acquired by personal experience of our sufferings. As God, He knows what is in us: but as man, He feels it also. And by this, wonderful as it may seem, He has acquired a fresh power, that of sympathy with us, and, in consequence, of helping us. See my sermon on this text, in Quebec Chapel Sermons, vol iii. p. 84. And this is the general view of expositors, both ancient and modern).

CHAP. III. 1—IV. 16.] THE SON OF GOD GREATER ALSO THAN MOSES: AND INFERENCES THEREFROM. The Writer has arrived, through the reasonings of ch. i. ii., at the mention of the High Priesthood of Jesus. He might at once have passed thence to the superiority of His High Priesthood to that of the imperfect priests on earth. But one point yet remains, without which the Gospel would not have its entire comparison with the law. The law was given by angels in the hand of a mediator. Moses was that mediator. Moses was above all others the prophet by whom God had spoken to the Fathers in times past. Christ therefore must be compared with Moses, and shewn to be greater than he. This being done, he returns again to his central idea, the High Priesthood of Christ (ch. iv. 14); and from thenceforward treats of and unfolds it. Ebrard gives the detailed connexion well: "The angel of the covenant came in the name of God before the people of Israel; Moses in the name of Israel before God: the High Priest came in the name of God before Israel (with the name 'Jehovah' on his forehead), and in the name of Israel (with the names of the twelve tribes on his breast) before God (Exod. xxviii. 9—29 and 36—68). Now the New Test. Messiah is above the angels, according to ch. i. ii. a) because in Himself as Son of God He is higher than they, and b) because in Him all humanity is exalted above the angels to lordship in the 'world to come,' and that by this means, because the Messiah is not only Angel, but also High Priest,—not only messenger of God to men, but also the propitiatory sacerdotal representative of men before God. Now exactly parallel with this runs our second part. The fundamental thesis, ch. iii. 3, 'For this person hath been counted worthy of more honour than Moses,' is plainly analogous in form with the fundamental thesis of the first part, i. 4, 'becoming so much better than the angels.' The New Test. Messiah is above Moses, because He a) of Himself, as Son of the house (iii. 6), is above him who was only the servant of the house (compare with iii. 5,—i. 14), and b) because the work, of bringing Israel into rest, which was not finished by Moses, is now finished by Him (iv. 1 ff.). And this work Christ has finished, by being not, as Moses, a mere leader and lawgiver, but at the same time a propitiatory representative, an High Priest (ch. v. 11 ff.). So far does the parallelism of the two portions reach even into details, that as the two divisions of the former part are separated by a hortatory passage, so are those of this part also:—

I. The Son and the angels.

a) The Son of God of Himself higher than the ministering spirits of God, i. 5—14.

(Hortatory passage, ii. 1—4.)

b) In Him manhood is exalted above the angels, ii. 5—16.

II. The Son and Moses.

a) The Son of the house of Israel higher than the servant of the house, iii. 1—6.

(Hortatory passage, iii. 7—19.)

b) In Him Israel has entered into rest, iv. 1—13.

For He was also High Priest, ii. 17, Thus He is also High Priest, ii. 17, 18. 14—16."

Ebrard has perhaps not enough noticed the prevalence of the hortatory mood not only in the interposed passage, iii. 7—19, but all through the section: compare iv. 1, 11, 14, 16.

1.] Whence (i.e. seeing that we have such a helper: it is connected with the result of ch. ii. The fact just announced in ii. 18, is a reason for our considering, &c.: see below), holy brethren (both these words are used in reference to the brethren, ch. ii. 11, 12. Not that the brethren here are Christ's brethren: but that the use of the word reminds them of that brotherhood in and because of Christ, of which he has before spoken. Whether the idea of common nationality is here to be introduced, is at least doubtful. I should rather regard it as swallowed up in the great brotherhood in Christ: and Bleek has well remarked, that, had the Writer been addressing believing Jews and Gentiles, or even believing Gentiles only, he would have used the same term of address, and without any conscious difference of meaning), partakers of an heavenly calling (the invitation, or summons, of God, calling men to His glory in Christ—and hence the state which is entered by them in pursuance of that calling: compare especially Phil. iii. 14. Then also heavenly means—a calling made from heaven, see ch. xii. 25. Or it may mean, the calling which proposes a heavenly reward,—whose inheritance is in heaven. By far the best way is, to join the two meanings together: heavenly in its purport and heavenward in its result), contemplate (survey, with a view to more closely considering, not, "pay attention to, be obedient to") the Apostle and High Priest (both words belong to the genitive, which follows) of our profession, Jesus (apostle, as superior to the angels, being Himself the angel of the covenant, God's greatest messenger: the word "angel," being avoided, on account of its technical use before, to prevent Christ being confused with the angels in nature. He is the "sent from the Father:" see John xx. 21.

[I may remark, that the circumstance of the Writer using the term "apostle" without scruple, as designating our Lord, may shew that the apostles, as a class, were not so distinctly marked as they have since been: a view supported also by some expressions of St. Paul: e.g. 2 Cor. viii. 23.] of our [Christian] confession,—i.e. of our faith. 2.] First, a point of likeness between our Lord and Moses is brought out, and that by a reference to an Old Test. declaration respecting the latter); that he is (not 'was.' The present sense must be retained here. Then a question arises: are we to understand it strictly of present time, of Christ now in heaven,—or as in the case cited, of general designation? Clearly, I think, of the latter: Jesus, whose character it is, that He is faithful. For the strict present would, to say nothing of other objections, not apply to the portion of the Lord's office, designated by the word "apostle," but only to that comprised under "High Priest." It characterizes faithfulness as His inherent attribute) faithful (it is questioned, whether or not this word refers back to the "faithful High Priest" of ch. ii. 18. The sense is certainly not the same: the faithfulness there being the fidelity wherewith He, being like His brethren, would, so to speak, reproduce their wants before God;—that here spoken of being His faithfulness to God, over whose house He is set, ver. 6. Still I cannot help thinking that the word itself is led to by, and takes up that other. That regarded more the sacerdotal, this regards the apostolic office of Christ) to him that made him (so we must render: not, 'that appointed him.' See this defended, and citations of the expression in both senses in the Fathers, in my Greek Test. The word thus taken, is of course to be understood of that constitution of our Lord as our Apostle and High Priest in which He, being human, was made by the Father: not of Him as the eternal Word, which would be irrelevant here, besides being against all Scripture precedent), as also (also—to take another instance of faithfulness: thus, with every circumstance of honour, is Moses introduced, before any disparagement of him is entered upon) [was] Moses in all his house (cited from Numbers in the references, "My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house." 1) It may be well to remark, that the substitution of his for "my" at once indicates to whom "His" is to be referred: viz. to God, who made him: see also below on ver. 6. And so most ancient and modern Commentators. 2) The circumstance of the quotation makes it far more natural to refer "in all His house" to Moses directly, and not to Christ, as some do, putting a comma at Moses. 3) The ellipsis is to be filled up by "was faithful" after "Moses," as in the place cited, and as in A. V. 4) The signification of "His house" is well illustrated by 1 Tim. iii. 15,—"the house of God, which is the church of the living God." It imports the Church of God: and is one and the same here and in ver. 6; not two different houses, but the same, in the case of Moses taken at one time only,—in that of Christ, in its whole existence and development).

3.] For (the for is best connected, as commonly, with the "consider" above: as containing the reason why our attention should be thus fixed on Jesus: for, though He has the quality of faithfulness in God's house in common with Moses, yet is He far more exalted and glorious than he) this person (better than "this man" of the A. V., which brings in an element not present here) hath been held worthy (the word includes, with the idea of 'accounting worthy,' that also of the actual bestowal of the dignity. It refers to the honour and glory wherewith God hath crowned Christ, in His exaltation to His right Hand; which is taken for granted without further explanation, as a fact well known to the readers) of more glory than Moses, inasmuch as he hath more honour than the house, who established it (so literally. The establishing here meant refers beyond doubt primarily to the erection of an actual house. The word is so used, of the preparation of a building,—a house, or temple, or ship, or town, &c.—In almost all the places where it occurs (see my Greek Test.) the verb may be so taken as to include not only the erection of the building, ship, &c., but also the fitting up, providing with proper furniture. And here also we may say, that it means more than the building of the house, and includes, besides the building of the house, the fitting it up and providing it with all requisites. So that to this establishment of the house belong servants, male and female; and so here we may say that the servants of the house are included. The sense then is this: just as he who has built and furnished a house,—for himself namely, as master of the house,—stands higher in honour than the house itself and the individual servants, so does Christ higher than Moses: and Christ is thus represented as he who has prepared the house of God [and therefore as its lord], to whom Moses also belongs as an individual servant).

4.] For (expansion and justification of the last verse) every house is established by some one (i. e. it belongs to the idea of a house that some one should have built and fitted it up: arrangement implies an arranger, design a designer); but (contrast as passing from the individual to the general) He which established all things is God (before treating of the misunderstanding of this verse by the fathers, and by many of the moderns, let us endeavour to grasp its true meaning. The last verse brings before us Christ as the establisher of the house of God. And this He is, in whatever sense the word "house" be taken: whether in the narrower sense which best suits this present comparison, or in the wider sense implied by the faithful centurion in Matt. viii. 9, in which all natural powers are his servants. But he is this, not by independent will or agency. "By whom also He made the worlds," is our Writer's own language of the creation by Christ: and it is in accord with that of St. John, where he says "all things were made by Him." He, as the Son, is He that established the house of God—the church, or the world, or the universe; but, apparently [compare ver 6], the former of these: but it is as one with—by virtue of his Sonship—Him who is the Establisher of all things, viz. God. And thus the his, twice repeated in vv. 5, 6, falls into its own place as belonging both times to God: Moses is His servant, part and portion of His household: Christ is His Son, over His household. And by this reference to God as the first Establisher, is the expression above, "him that made him," illustrated and justified. So that this verse is not parenthetical, as almost all the recent expositors make it,—but distinctly part of the argument. The ancient expositors, almost without exception, take "God" as predicate, and "He that established all things" as a designation of Christ—"now He that founded all things, is [must be] God:" thus making the passage a proof of the deity of Christ. But, apart from the extreme harshness and forcing of the construction to bring out this meaning, the sentiment itself is entirely irrelevant here. If the Writer was proving Christ to be greater than Moses inasmuch as He is God, the founder of all things, then clearly the mere assertion of this fact would have sufficed for the proof, without entering on another consideration: nay, after such an assertion, all minor considerations would have been not only superfluous, but preposterous. He does however, after this, distinctly go into the consideration of Christ being faithful not as a servant but as a son: so that he cannot be here speaking of His Deity as a ground of superiority).

5.] The argument proceeds, resuming the common ground of ver. 2. And Moses indeed (inasmuch as but following has the effect of bringing out, and thus emphasizing, Christ, this indeed, or verily, may almost be treated as a particle of disparagement) [was] faithful in all His (i. e. God's, compare above the words of the citation, on ver. 2. It is necessary in the English to mark this reference, which otherwise would be missed) house, as a servant (compare as above; the word servant is often applied in the Old Test. to Moses:

 see Exod. iv. 10, xiv. 31: Numb. xii. 7, 8:
 Josh. i. 2, &c. The Greek word used here for servant is not that which signifies slave, but a more honourable one, designating all who minister to one another on any account), for testimony of the things which were to be [afterwards] spoken (these words are not to be joined with “servant,” nor with “faithful,” but with the whole preceding sentence: the purpose of the faithful service of Moses in God’s house was, for testimony, &c. The things which were to be spoken after can only mean the Gospel (see the various insufficient meanings which have been given and discussed in my Greek Test.). Owen observes, “This as well the order of the words as the import of them doth require.
 In his ministry he was a testimony, or, by what he did in the service of the house he gave testimony: whereunto? to the things that were afterwards to be spoken, viz. in the fulness of time, the appointed season, by the Messiah: i. e. the things of the gospel. And this indeed was the proper end of all that Moses did or ordered in the house of God”); but Christ (understand, is faithful). Then, supplying this, are we to join it with “over his house,” or to insert it before the words “as a Son,” and take it absolutely? Certainly the latter, as shewn by the order of the words in the previous sentence; the ellipsis here being, to judge by that order, between “but Christ” and “as,” not between “Son” and “over”) as a Son over His house (his here again of God,—not primarily, though of course by inference, of Christ. The house is God’s throughout: but Christ is of primary authority and glory in it, inasmuch as He is the Son in the house, and actually established the house. This, which I am persuaded is required by the context, is shewn decisively by ch. x. 21, “Having . . . a great High Priest over the house of God.” Most Commentators refer it to Christ; and some, as A. V., understand “his” to mean “his own.” But thus the parallelism is destroyed, and in fact the identity of the house in the two cases, on which depends the strictness of the comparison between Moses and Christ. Ehrard has maintained that two houses are intended: “in the one house serves Moses for a testimony of the future revelations of God, the house itself being part of the testimony: the other house, the house of Christ, are we: it is a living house, built of living stones.” But this introduces a complicated comparison, and to my mind infinitely weakens the argument. There is but one house throughout, and that one, the Church of God, in which both are faithful; one as a servant, the other as a son: this house was Israel, this house are we, if we are found faithful in the covenant; whose (not [except by inference] Christ’s. Besides the considerations urged above as affecting the question, we have the strong argument from Scripture analogy, compare 1 Tim. iii. 15; 1 Pet. iv. 17;

 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17; 2 Cor. vi. 16; Eph. ii.
 22; ch. x. 21, xii. 22; Rev. iii. 12: which alone, especially ch. x. 21, would go very far with me to decide the question) house are we (the Writer and his Hebrew readers: of whose house we are, even as Moses was), if we hold fast the confidence and the matter of boasting of our hope (see Rom. v. 2).

 lowing verb is to be connected with *where-“harden not,” and regard the Writer as making the Spirit’s words his own: but this labours under the great difficulty that in ver. 9 the speaker is God Himself, and so an unnatural break is made at the end of

 ver. 8. Others believe that the construc-

But by far the best way is, to take the whole citation, including the formula of citation, as a parenthesis, and join wherefore with take heed, ver. 12. The length of such parenthesis is no objection to this view: see ch. vii. 20—22; xii. 18—24, where the Writer, after similar parentheses, returns back into the previous construction. Nor again is it any objection, that in the midst of the citation, another "wherefore" occurs, ver. 10: for that "wherefore" belongs strictly to the citation, and finds both its preparation and its resulting clause within its limits),—even as the Holy Spirit saith (in Ps. xcv., Hebrew and English. This Psalm in the Hebrew has no writer's name: in the Septuagint it is headed, "a psalm of praise of (or, to) David." And it is ascribed to David in ch. iv. 7 below. The passage is cited as the direct testimony of the Holy Spirit, speaking through David), To-day if ye hear his voice (in the Psalm, according to the Hebrew, the words corresponding to these, the second half of the 7th verse, form an independent sentence, to be taken as a powerful exhortation expressed in the form of a wish. The sense from ver. 6 is,—Come let us fall down and bow ourselves, kneel before Jehovah our Creator. For He is our God, and we the people of his pasture and the flock of his hand.' Then this sentence follows: 'O that ye might this day hearken to His voice!' "This day" stands first, with strong emphasis, in contrast to the whole past time, during which they had shewn themselves disobedient and rebellious against the divine voice, as e. g. during the journey through the wilderness, alluded to in the following verses: 'to-day' therefore means 'now,' 'now at length.' Then in the following verses, to the end of the Psalm, is introduced, that which the divine voice, which they are to hear, addresses to them. To-day will thus refer to the day in which the Psalm was used in public worship, whenever that might be. See below), harden not your hearts (Hebrew, heart. Bleek remarks, that this is the only place where this expression 'to harden the heart,' is [in the original Hebrew text: the A. V. is inaccurate in Exod. viii. 15, 32, 1 Sam. vi. 6, where the expression is, literally rendered, to make heavy or dull] used of man's own act: elsewhere it is always of God's act, compare Exod. iv. 21; vii. 3 [vii. 22; viii. 19]; ix. 12 [35]; x. 20, 27; xi. 10; xiv. 1, 17; Isa. lxiii. 17; and with "spirit," Deut. ii. 30; whereas when the hardening is described as the work of man, the formula "to stiffen the neck" is used, Deut. x. 16; Neh. ix. 17, 29; 2 Chron. xxx. 8; xxxvi. 13; Jer. vii. 26; 2 Kings xvii. 14. For New Test. usage see Acts xix. 9; Rom. ix. 18), as in the provocation (the Hebrew has, 'as [at] Meribah.' In Exod. xvii. 1—7 we read that the place where the children of Israel murmured against the Lord for want of water was called Massah and Meribah. But the subsequent account of Num. xx. 1—13, makes it plain that the two names refer to two different events and places: and this is further confirmed by Deut. xxxiii. 8,—"Thy holy One whom thou didst prove at Massah, and with whom thou didst strive at the waters of Meribah." In the Psalm these two are mentioned together, and the Septuagint as usual translate the names. In giving, for the proper names, their meaning and occasion, they have in fact cast light upon the sacred text; though it is rather comment than strict translation), in the time of (in the Hebrew this second clause is distinct from the first, and introduces a fresh instance: see below) the day of the temptation in the wilderness (Hebrew, "as in the day of Massah in the wilderness:" viz. that of the second murmuring against Moses and Aaron for want of water: see Num. xx. 1—13. The place was in the wilderness of Sin, near Kadesh: ib. ver. 1): where your fathers tempted, by way of trial ('tempted [me] in trying,' or 'proving [me]''), and saw my works (Hebrew, "moreover they saw my work"—i. e. my penal judgments; for these penal judgments lasted during the forty years, and it is they which are described in the next sentence. The meaning given by most expositors, "although they saw my works [miracles of deliverance, &c.] for forty years," is not so likely, seeing that these provocations happened at the beginning of the forty years. But see below) forty years (these words in the Hebrew most probably belong, as rendered in our A. V., to what follows: "I was grieved with this generation forty years:" an arrangement rendered impossible here, on account of wherefore intervening.—But that such arrangement was not unknown to our Writer is plain, from his presently saying, ver. 17, "With whom was he grieved forty years?" It is therefore likely that he did not choose this arrangement without reason. And if we ask what that reason was, we find an answer in the probability that the forty years' space is taken as representing to the Hebrews their space for repentance; their "to-day" between the opening of the preaching of the gospel [compare ch. ii. 2], and their impending destruction. This idea was recognized by the Jews themselves in their books: "How long endure the years of the Messiah? Rabbi Eliezer said, forty years, in like manner as the children of Israel were this number of years in the wilderness." "And if," says Bleek, "this idea of the days of the Messiah was prevalent, that they were the immediate precursors of the 'age to come,' as the time of the great Sabbath-rest and the completed glory of the people of God,—this is something very analogous to the acceptance of the period of the forty years which seems to underlie what is said of them in our Epistle." If so, it is possible that the meaning may be, that they saw My wonderful works and took no heed to them, and thereby increased their guilt).

10.] Wherefore (see above: it is inserted, to mark more strongly the reference of the forty years to the preceding. It is impossible, with this particle of inference, to join those words to this sentence. Instead of being anxious, as some Commentators are, at the expense of the meaning of words, to put our citations straight to the letter, it is far better to recognize at once the truth, for such it is, which Calvin here so boldly states: "We know that the Apostles, in citing testimonies, are more attentive to the main subject, than anxious about words") I was offended with this generation (the Septuagint has "that generation," as the received text here: there is no demonstrative in the original Hebrew,—the generation. The change seems to be made by our Writer for a set purpose, viz., to extend the saying, by making "generation" thus import the whole Jewish people,—the then living race, as well as that which provoked God in the wilderness. Compare Matt. xxiv. 34, and note), and said, They do alway err in their heart (Hebrew, "They are a people of wanderers in heart"); but they (in Hebrew, merely "and they") knew not (never knew: their ignorance preceded their wandering, and is treated as the antecedent fact to it. The not knowing, where matters of practical religion are concerned, implies the not following) my ways (i.e., the ways which I would have them to walk in: so Gen. vi. 12; Exod. xviii. 20). As according ("in conformity with the fact, that:" such conformity not necessarily implying that the excluding oath was prior to the disobedience, but only that the oath and the disobedience were strict correlatives of one another. As the one, so was the other) I sware (see Numb. xiv. 21 ff.; xxxii. 10 ff.; Deut. i. 34 ff.) in my wrath, if they shall enter (so literally: this elliptical form of an oath stands for a strong negative: it is sometimes, when man is the speaker, filled up by "The Lord do so to me and more also, if...") Compare reference Mark; 2 Sam. iii. 35, and other places. It is interpreted below, ver. 18: "to whom sware he that they should not enter," &c.) into my rest (in the Psalm, and in the places referred to above, the rest is, primarily, the promised land of Canaan. In Dent. xii. 9, 10, the words "rest" and "giving you rest" are used of the promised inheritance of Canaan. But it has been well noticed, that after Joshua had led the people into the land, they never in reality enjoyed entirely the rest which had been promised;—and in consequence, the meaning of that threat of God opened out before them, and it became plain that more was denounced upon the generation than one generation merely could exhaust, more also than the mere not entering into Canaan. Hence the prophetic pregnancy of the oath became evident, and its meaning was carried on in this exhortation by the Psalmist, and is here carried on by the sacred Writer of this Epistle, to a further rest which then remained for Israel, and now still remains for the people of God). <sup>12.</sup>

Take heed (on the connexion of this with “wherefore” above, ver. 7, see note there), brethren, lest there shall be in any one of you (not the same as “among you.” It is more searching, in meaning not the whole flock only, but every individual member of it. “The good shepherd ought so to watch for the whole flock, as not to neglect a single sheep.” Calvin) an evil heart of unbelief (the genitive is possessive; an evil heart belonging to, characteristic of, unbelief. This is plain, from the consideration that unbelief is throughout the leading idea, compare ver. 19, and ch. iv. 3,—and not the evil heart. Unbelief must be kept to its simple primary meaning, not rendered disobedience; it was not this, but disbelief in the strictest sense, which excluded them, and against which the Hebrews are warned. That it led on to disobedience, we all know, but this is not before us here), in (the element in which the existence of such an evil heart of unbelief would be shewn) departing (apostatizing, falling from the faith: see below) from the living God (by using this solemn title of God, he not only warns them from Whom, and at what risk, they would depart, but also identifies the God whom they would leave, with Him who had so often called Himself by this name as the distinctive God of Israel, and as contrasted with the dumb and impotent idols of other nations. And thus he shows them that Israel, and the privileges and responsibilities of Israel, were now transferred to the Christian church, from which if they fell away they would be guilty of apostasy from the God of Israel. Compare the three other places [reft.] where the term occurs in our Epistle, and the notes there).

<sup>13.</sup> But exhort yourselves (so, in a literal rendering, should the word be given, and not “one another,” though English idiom may require this latter in a version intended for use. This is especially meant, that in the church one should exhort another: yet not excluding the implication, that each one should himself be exhorted by his exhortation of the church. In Col. iii. 16, we have the same relation expressed) day by day, as long as the [word] “To-day” is named (i. e., as long as that period endures, which can be called by the name “to-day” as used in the Psalm. That period would be here, the day of grace: the short time [see ch. x. 25, 37] before the coming of the Lord); that from among you (emphatic, as contradistinguished from “your fathers” ver. 9) no one be hardened (as they, ver. 8) by deceit of (arising out of, belonging to) his sin (compare Rom. vii. 11, “For sin . . . deceived me and slew me.” See also Eph. iv. 22. In ch. xi. 25, xii. 4, “sin” is similarly used for defection from God).

<sup>14.</sup> A reason given for taking heed, &c., enforcing the caution; since it is only by endurance that we can become partakers of Christ. For we have become (Bleek remarks, “Our Writer loves the use of this term, ‘have become,’ where he designates a state to which any one has attained, even where it would have been sufficient to have expressed simply the being in that state.” See text and notes, ch. v. 11, 12; vii. 16, 20, 22, 23; xii. 8. But here it is rather perhaps anticipatory, looking on to the fulfilment of the condition to be stated) partakers of Christ (some take these words to signify 'fellow-partakers with Christ;' but improperly), if, that is, we hold fast (see on ver. 6) the beginning of our confidence (some render this, "the beginning of the subsistence of Christ in us." But there can be little doubt that the text is right.

It is, however, somewhat doubtful, whether by the expression is to be understood our incipient confidence, which has not yet reached its perfection,—or, "our former confidence," see 1 Tim. v. 12; Rev. ii. 4, 5. This latter is taken by very many; but the other is far better, inasmuch as it keeps the contrast between beginning and end: "if we hold fast this beginning of our confidence firm until the end." Otherwise, by making the beginning of merely mean the former, the contrast vanishes) firm unto the end (the end thought of is, not the death of each individual, but the coming of the Lord, which is constantly called by this name).

15.] The whole connexion and construction of this verse is very difficult. I have discussed them in full in my Greek Test.; and have concluded that the words are to be taken as a proof that we must hold fast &c. in order to be partakers of Christ. I would render then, "since it is said," or in more idiomatic English, for it is said, To-day if ye hear His voice, harden not your hearts, as in the provocation. Thus the context goes on smoothly, and the purpose of the whole is to shew, as is summed up in ver. 12, that (ver. 12) it is the wicked heart of unbelief which they have above all things to avoid. This argument is now carried forward by taking up the word provocation, and asking, in a double question, who they were that provoked, and with whom it was that He was offended.

"For some, when they had heard, did provoke; howbeit not all that came out of Egypt by Moses:"—the exceptions being, Caleb and Joshua, and all under twenty years old, and the women and Levites. But if we come to examine, (a) what contextual sense such a sentence can bear, or even (b) how our Writer would probably have expressed such a meaning, we shall find reason at once to reject the interpretation. For (a), the purpose here is clearly not to bring out the exceptions to those who were included in this saying, a process which would have quite defeated the purpose of the exhortation, seeing that the rebellious would be designated merely by some, and the exceptions would appear to be by far the greater number: and so every reader might shelter himself under the reflection that he was one of the faithful many, not one of the rebellious "some." Nor again (b) would this, as mere matter of fact, have been thus expressed by the Writer. For it obviously was not so. The "some" were the faithful few, not the rebellious many: "but with the greater part of them God was not well pleased," 1 Cor. x. 5. As regards the context, the course of thought is in fact just contrary to what this construction would require. The faithful exceptions are overlooked, and the whole of Israel is included in the provocation, to make the exhortation fall more forcibly on the readers.

For ("you need indeed to be careful against unbelief:—for on account of this very unbelief all our fathers were excluded") who, when they had heard (in immediate reference to "if ye hear," ver. 7), provoked (viz. God)? Nay, was it not all who (as above noticed, the exceptions are put out of sight, and that which was true of almost all, asserted generally) came out from Egypt by means of Moses? And (literally, but; it simply brings out the very slight contrast of a second and new particular, and therefore must in English be expressed by and. It is 'but' in the A. V.: but that is because they take ver. 16 in the manner above rejected, as an assertion) with whom was He offended forty years (see on vv. 9, 10, and the consonance, in the connexion of forty years with the verb, with that in the Psalm, which was there departed from)? was it not with those who sinned, whose carcases (literally, members of the body, but especially the legs: taken also for the legs and arms, i. e. limbs: probably with the meaning that their bodies should fall and perish limb from limb in the wilderness: so Beza: "By this word is signified not so much that they died by the ordinary means, or by any plague, as that they fell in the desert by their bodies gradually wasting away") fell in the wilderness (see 1 Cor. x. 5. The words here are exactly those of Numb. xiv. 29. Again, we must remember, in explaining these words, that the Writer is not bearing in mind at this moment the exceptions, but speaking generally)? And to whom sware He that they should not enter into His rest, except to those who disobeyed (not, as A. V., "believed not:" this was a fact, and was indeed the root of their disobedience)?

19.] And [thus] we see that they were not able to enter in (however much they desired it: they were incapacitated by not fulfilling the condition of inheriting all God's promises, belief and resulting obedience) on account of unbelief (see above on ver. 12. This verse forms a kind of 'quod erat demonstrandum' [as Ebrard], enclenching the argument which has been proceeding since ver. 12. The Writer now proceeds to make another use of the example on which he has been so long dwelling).

CHAP. IV. 1—13.] In the Son, Israel enters into the true rest of God. On the mingling of the hortatory form with the progress of the argument, see the summary at ch. iii. 1.

1.] Let us fear therefore (this form of expressing the caution seems purposely chosen to express the fear and trembling, Phil. ii. 12, with which every servant of God, however free from slavish terror and anxiety, ought to work out his salvation), lest, a promise being still left us (notice the present—not "having been left us." On the force of this present, very much of the argument rests) of entering into His rest (it is to be observed, that in the argument in this chapter, the Writer departs from the primary sense of the words "my rest" in the Psalm, and lays stress on His, making it God's rest, the rest into which God has entered; see below on ver. 10. And this is very important as to the nature of the rest in question, as importing, not the land of Canaan, but the heavenly home which that earthly rest mystically foreshadowed. Of course all references of the rest spoken of to the period after the destruction of Jerusalem, as Hammond, or to the cessation of Levitical ordinances, as Michaelis, are inadequate and out of the question), any one of you (although the communicative form has been used before in "let us fear," the second person is here returned to; and of purpose. A similar change is found in ch. x. 24, 25: and in Rom. xiv. 13) appear (see below) to have fallen short of it (i. e. be found, when the great trial of all shall take place, to have failed of, = to have no part in,—the promise. So that appear is, as so many both of ancients and moderns have taken it, a mild term, conveying indeed a sterner intimation behind

<sup>2</sup> For unto us was the gospel preached, as well as unto them: but the word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it. <sup>3</sup> For we which have believed do enter into rest, as he said, As I have sworn in my wrath, if they shall enter into my rest: although the works were it).

2.] The former half of this verse substantiates the expression "being still left" of the last verse. The stress is not, "we, as well as they:" but lies on have good tidings been preached, which includes both us and them.

For good tidings have been also announced to us, as likewise to them (they were not the same good tidings in the two cases: but the Writer treats them as the same. To them indeed it was primarily the inheritance of the land of promise: but even then, as proved below, the term my rest had a further meaning, which meaning reaches even down to us): nevertheless the word of [their] hearing (of hearing, genitive of apposition; the word and the hearing being commensurate: "the word of [consisting in] that which they heard") did not profit them, unmingled as they were in faith with its hearers.

The passage is almost a desperate one. I have discussed it, in its various readings and meanings, in my Greek Test., and, deeming it necessary to adopt the reading followed in the text, have found this meaning,—"And so these men received no benefit from 'the word of hearing,' because they were not one in faith with its hearers; did not correspond, in their method of receiving it, with faithful hearers, whom it does profit." I have stated that this interpretation does not satisfy me: but it seems the only escape from violation either of the rules of criticism or of those of grammar: and therefore I am constrained to accept it until some better is suggested.

3.] For (taking up again the word "faith" in ver. 2) we do enter (are to enter. Some Commentators have seen a communicative and conciliatory tone in the first person here. But Bleek and Lünemann well remark that it is not so; for the fact of believing brings out a class distinct from the rest, as in ch. vi. 18, xii. 25) into the (aforesaid) rest

(not only, as A. V., "into rest," abstract), we who believed (the past tense is anticipatory, the standing-point being, the day of entering into the rest. It was unbelief which excluded them: the promise still remains unfulfilled, see below: they who at the time of its fulfilment shall be found to have believed, shall enter into it), even as He hath said (this citation evidently does not refer to the whole of what has just been said, but only to the fact, that the rest has not yet been entered into in the sense of the promise. The condition, believing, is not yet brought into treatment, but follows below in ver. 11 in hortatory form, having in fact been demonstrated already in ch. iii. 12—19), As I swear in my wrath, if (see above on ch. iii. 11) they shall enter into my rest: although (the context is much disputed. I believe it will be best taken thus: the Writer is leading on to the inference, that the entering into God's rest is a thing YET FUTURE for God's people. And this he thus brings about. "My rest" is not a thing future for God:—He has already entered therein,—ver. 4. Still [ver. 5] we have again, after God had thus entered in, the oath, They shall not, &c. Consequently, since [ver. 6] it remains that some must enter in, and they to whom it was first promised did not, on account of unbelief,—for that they did not [i.e. none of them did], is plain by His repeating in David, after the lapse of so many centuries, the same warning again [ver. 7], which He would not have done if Joshua had led Israel into that rest [ver. 8]:—since this is so, the sabbatism of God's people is YET FUTURE [ver. 9], and reserved for that time when they shall rest from their labours, as God from His [ver. 10]. Then follows a concluding exhortation, vv. 11—16. Thus all is clear, and according to the progress of the argument. See other proposed meanings discussed in my Gr. Test.) the works (viz. of God: an expression borrowed from the citation which follows) were constituted (i. e. finished) from the foundation of the world (i. e. as substantiated in next verse, though God Himself had not that rest to enter into, and did not mean this by my rest, but had entered into the rest of which He speaks: the key-verse to this being ver. 10).

4.] Substantiation of the last assertion. For he (God, not Moses, nor the scripture: see ch. xiii. 5) hath spoken somewhere (see above on ch. ii. 6) concerning the seventh day on this wise, And God rested (the rest here spoken of must not be understood only as that of one day after the completion of creation; but as an enduring rest, commencing then and still going on,—into which God's people shall hereafter enter. Still less must we find here any discrepancy with such passages as John v. 17: Isa. xl. 28: God's rest is not a rest necessitated by fatigue, nor conditioned by idleness: but it is, in fact, the very continuance in that upholding and governing, of which the Creation was the beginning) on the seventh day from all His works.

5.] And in this (place: our present passage) again (i. e. on the other hand: a citation which shall qualify and explain that other, making it impossible that men should have already entered into it), If they shall enter into my rest (these words are to be taken exactly as before, in a strong negative sense. The point raised is, that in the days of Moses, nay, long after, of David, men had not yet, in the full sense at least, entered into that rest, because it was spoken of as yet future: it being of no import to the present argument, whether that future is of an affirmative or negative proposition: the negative denunciation in fact implying in itself the fact, that some would enter therein).

6.] Since then it yet remains (this is the sense in all places where the word is used: remains over, not having been previously exhausted. The time indicated by the present here is that following on the threat above) that some enter into it (viz. by the very expectation implied in the terms of the exclusion—"These shall not:" therefore there are that shall: because, the entering in of some being a portion of God's purposes, the failure of these persons will not change nor set aside that purpose. This latter consideration however does not logically come into treatment, but is understood;—"since what God once purposed, He always purposes"), and those who were formerly (as contrasted with David's time, and with the present) the subjects of its announcement (viz. the Israelites in the wilderness) did not enter in on account of disobedience (not, 'unbelief:' see on ch. iii. 18. The first clause, Seeing therefore, &c., was a deduction from the terms of the divine denunciation, as to God's general purpose; and now this second clause is a particular concrete instance in which that general purpose was not carried out. Since some must, and they did not, the implied promise is again found recurring many centuries after): again (emphatic: anew), He limiteth (has fixed, specifies, assigns the time) a certain day, saying "To-day" in David ("in," as we say, "in Isaiah," meaning, "in the book of Isaiah"), after (the lapse of) so long a time (viz. the time between Joshua and David); as it hath been said before (viz. ch. iii. 7, 15: there can hardly be a question that the reference of the words is backward, to what has been already cited, not forwards to the words which follow), To-day if ye hear His voice, harden not your hearts. <sup>8.</sup>] Confirmation of the above, as against an exception that might be taken, that notwithstanding the exclusion of many by unbelief, those who entered the promised land with Joshua did enter into that rest of God. For if Joshua (it does not appear that any parallel between the typical and the great final Deliverer is intended: but it could hardly fail to be suggested to the readers. Our translators, in retaining "Jesus" (the Greek form of Joshua) here, have introduced into the mind of the ordinary English reader utter confusion. It was done in violation of their instructions, which prescribed that all proper names should be rendered as they were commonly used) had given them rest (led them into this rest of which we are treating), He (God: the subject of "limiteth" and "saying" above) would not speak (not 'have spoken,' as A. V.) after this of another day. <sup>9.</sup>] Consequence from the proposition in ver. 6. Some must enter therein: some, that is, analogous to, inheriting the condition of and promises made to, those first, who did not enter in because of disobedience. These are now specified as "the people of God," doubtless with a reference to the true spiritual character of Israelites indeed, represented under their external name: and their rest is no longer a "rest" merely, but (see below) is called by a higher and nobler name. Therefore (see above) there is yet reserved (see on ver. 6: remains as yet unexhausted, unoccupied, unrealized) a keeping of sabbath (the term is used here to correspond to "my rest," specified and explained in ver. 4. God's rest was a keeping of sabbath: so also will ours be. The idea of the rest hereafter being the antitype of the Sabbath-rest, was familiar to the Jews. They spoke of the "age to come" as the "day which is all sabbath." It is hardly probable that the sacred Writer had in his mind the object which Calvin mentions: "I doubt not that the Apostle purposely alludes to the Sabbath, to dissuade the Jews from its outward observance: for thus only can its abrogation be understood, by the understanding its spiritual end." Still more alien from the sense and context is it to use this verse, as some have absurdly done, as carrying weight one way or the other in the controversy respecting the obligation of a sabbath under the Christian dispensation. The only indication it furnishes is negative: viz. that no such term as "keeping of sabbath" could then have been, in the minds of Christians, associated with the keeping of the Lord's day: otherwise, being already present, it could not be said that it is yet reserved) for the people of God (the well-known designation of Israel the covenant people. It occurs again, ch. xi. 25. Here it is used of that veritable Israel, who inherit God's promises by faith in Christ: compare Gal. vi. 16). <sup>10.</sup>] is taken in two ways: 1. as a general axiom, justifying the use of the words "keeping of sabbath" above: For he that entered into his (God's) rest, himself also rested from his (own) works, like as God rested from his own. This has been the usual explanation. Theophylact says, "He is explaining, in what sense he called such a rest a sabbatism: because, he says, we also rest from our works, as also God, when He rested from His works in creating the world, named the day the Sabbath." This explanation labours under two difficulties: (a) the past tense, 'entered into his rest,' which thus is made into a perfect or a present; (b) the double reference of his, first to God, and then to the man in question, especially when God's works are taken up by the strong term his own. 2. The other interpretation has been that of Owen, and others, and recently Ebrard, who refer he that entered to Christ: For He that entered into his (own or God's) rest. Himself also rested from His works like as God rested from His own: and therefore, from our Forerunner having entered into this sabbatism, it is reserved for us, the people of God, to enter into it with and because of Him. Thus, as Ebrard says, Jesus is placed in the liveliest contrast to Joshua, who had not brought God's people to their rest; and is designated as "That one, who entered into God's rest." And to this view I own I am strongly inclined, notwithstanding the protest raised against it by Bleek, Lünemann, and Delitzsch. My reasons are, in addition to those implied above, a) the form of the assertion, as regards Joshua here and Jesus in ver. 14. That a contrast is intended between the Jesus who did not give them rest, and the "Great High Priest who is gone through the heavens, Jesus the Son of God," seems very plain. And if so, it would be easily accounted for, that Christ should be here introduced merely under the designation of He that entered into his rest. b) the introduction of the words he himself also, lifting out and dignifying the subject of this clause as compared with God, in a way which would hardly be done, had the assertion been merely of any man generally. c) Scripture analogy. This rest, into which the Lord Jesus entered, is spoken of Isa. xi. 10, "And His rest shall be glorious:" and this work of His, in Isa. xl. 10, "His work is before Him:" and by Christ Himself, John ix. 4, "I must work the works of Him that sent me while it is day." d) The expression that rest below, which stands harshly insulated, unless it refers to the rest in this verse. e) The whole context: see summary at ch. iii. 1. Render then: For He that entered into his (either, "God's;" or more probably merely "his," reflective, as in Isa. xi. 10 above) rest, He Himself also (on this, see above) rested from his works (see above) as God from his own (His own, not with any distinction of kind, but used only to mark distinction of possession).

11—13.] Exhortation, so frequently interspersed in the midst of the argument: see on ch. iii. 1. Let us therefore (consequence from vv. 3—7; seeing that the promise is held out to us, as it was to them, and that they failed of it through disobedience) earnestly strive to enter into that rest (viz that mentioned in ver. 10, into which Christ has entered before: compare ver. 11, ch. vi. 20), lest any one fall into (not, as A. V. and others, "fall after") the same example of disobedience (not, unbelief: see on ch. iii. 18. It was they that disobeyed who failed to enter in).

12, 13.] Apart from the difficulties of some terms used, we may give the connexion thus: Such an endeavour is well worth all our earnestness—for we have One to do with, who can discern and will punish every even the most secret disobedience. For the word of God (in what sense? 1) The Personal Word has been understood by many, e.g., the Fathers in general, and not a few moderns. To this the first obvious objection is, that this mode of expression is confined to St. John among the New Test. writers. This however, though clearly not to be met by alleging such passages as Luke i. 2; Acts xx. 32, is not decisive. For our Epistle, though perhaps anterior to all the writings of St. John, is yet so intimately allied to the Alexandrine terminology, that it would be no matter of surprise to find its Writer using a term so nearly ripe for his purpose as we find "the Word" in Philo [see below]. The real objections to the Personal Word being simply and directly here meant, lie in the Epistle, and indeed in the passage itself. In the Epistle: for we have nowhere in it this term used with any definiteness of our Lord, nor indeed any approach to it; and powerful, and sharper than any twoedged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a dis-not even where we might have expected it most, in the description of His relation to the Father, ch. i. init. Every where He is the Son of God, not His Word. And in ch. vi. 5, xi. 3, where he says the worlds were made by the Word of God, he uses not the Greek word logos, by which the Personal Word is always designated, but another word (rhema), by which He never is. And in the passage itself: for such adjectives as he here joins to "the Word of God," as matter of emphatic predication, would hardly be used of the Personal Word: and, which to my mind is stronger evidence still, had these words applied to our Lord, we should not have had Him introduced immediately after, ver. 14, as "Jesus the Son of God." But 2) some of the ancient, and the great mass of modern Commentators, have understood by the term, the revealed word of God, in the law and in the gospel: or in the gospel alone, as contrasted with the former dispensation. And so even some of those who elsewhere in their writings have understood it of Christ. But neither does this interpretation seem to meet the requirements of the passage. The qualities here predicated of the "Word" do not appear to fit the mere written word: nor does the introduction of the written word suit the context. I should be rather disposed with Bleek to understand 3) the spoken word of God, the utterance of His power, by which, as in ch. xi. 3, He made the worlds,—by which His Son, as in ch. i. 3, upholds all things. This spoken word it was, which they of old were to hear and not harden their hearts: "To-day if ye hear his voice . . .:" this spoken word, which interdicted them from entering into His rest—"I swear in my wrath, If they shall enter into my rest." It seems then much more agreeable to the context, to understand this utterance of God, so nearly connected with God Himself, the breath of his mouth: and I would not at the same time shrink from the idea, that the Alexandrine form of expression respecting the Word, that semi-personification of it without absolutely giving it personal existence, was before the mind of the Writer. Indeed, I do not see how it is possible to escape this inference) is living (not, in contrast with the dead works of the law [Ebrard], of which there is no question here: nor, nourishing, and able to preserve life: nor, enduring: but, as A. V., quick, i. e. having living power, in the same sense in which God Himself is so often called "the living God," e. g. ch. x. 31), and active (this activity is the very first quality and attribute of life: so that the predicates form a climax: not only living, but energizing: not only energizing, but sharper, &c.: and not only that, but piercing, &c.: nor that only, but reaching even to the spirit, a discernor of the thoughts and ideas of the heart), and sharper than every twoedged sword (literally, two-mouthed: meaning, sharpened on both sides, both edge and back. The comparison of the word of God or of men to a sword is common in Scripture: see Ps. lvii. 4, lix. 7, lxiv. 3; Wisd. xviii. 15, 16; Rev. i. 16; and above all, Eph. vi. 17. It has been questioned, whether the office here ascribed to the word of God is punitive, or merely searching: whether it regards the foes, or the servants of God. There seems no reason why we should separate the two. The same word, to which evidently by the succeeding clause is attributed the searching power, is powerful also to punish. The knife [the word commonly used for sword in the New Test. signified both] belongs to the surgeon, and to the judge: has its probing, as well as its smiting office), and reaching through, even to dividing of soul and spirit, both joints and marrow (there has been considerable diversity in the taking of these genitives. I have regarded them as follows: soul and spirit denote two separate departments of man's being, each subordinate to the process indicated by dividing. The Word pierces to the dividing, not of the soul from the spirit, but of the soul itself and of the spirit itself: the former being the lower portion of man's invisible part, which he has in common with the brutes; the latter the higher portion, receptive of the Spirit of God; both which are pierced and divided by the sword of the Spirit, the Word of God. Then passing on to both joints and marrow, I do not regard these terms as co-ordinate with the former, "soul and spirit," but as subordinate to them, and as used in a spiritual sense, not a corporeal: implying that both the joints and the marrow of the soul and of the spirit are pierced and divided by the Word. This I conceive is necessitated both by the wording of the original, and by the sense, which otherwise would degenerate into an anti-climax, if joints and marrow were to be understood of the body. The other views are, 1) That which regards the dividing as being a division of the soul from the spirit, the joints from the marrow. The objections to this are both psychological and contextual. It has been rightly urged [see especially Ebrard's note here] that the soul and spirit cannot be said to be separated in any such sense as this [Ecumenius understands the taking away of the Holy Spirit from man's soul to be meant]: and on the other hand the joints and marrow could not be thus said to be separated, having never been in contact with one another. 2) Many Commentators, who hold the division of soul from spirit, are not prepared to apply the same interpretation to the "joints and marrow." 3) Many understand the dividing to mean, not the act of division, but the place where the division occurs: where soul divides from spirit, and joints from marrow: i. e. to the innermost recesses of soul and body. The objection to this arises from its not satisfying the requirements of grammar in the original, and a judger (or, discerner) of (the) thoughts and ideas (this seems the nearest term to the Greek: not "intents," as A. V.) of the heart (the inner and thinking and feeling part of man).

<sup>13</sup>] And there is not a creature (the term embraces all created things, visible and invisible, compare Col. i. 16) unseen in His presence (first as to the possessive pronoun: to what does it refer? to the word of God, or to God Himself? The idea of its referring to Christ falls with the untenableness of the personal meaning of the Word: although some, abandoning that, yet hold it. Then of the two other, it seems much the more obvious to refer it to God, especially in the presence of "the eyes of Him with whom we have to do" below. Nor is there any harshness in this; from speaking of the uttered word of God, whose powers are not its own but His, the transition to Himself, with whom that word is so nearly identified, is simple and obvious): but (nay, rather . . . i. e. so far from this, that . . .) all things are naked and lying open (the Greek word thus rendered is a very unusual and difficult one. Its intention seems to be to convey the idea of entire prostration and subjugation under the eye of God: so that the things of which this is said are not only naked, stripped of all covering and concealment,—but also laid prostrate in their exposure, before His eye. See the whole matter discussed in my Greek Test. It is one which can hardly be made intelligible to the mere English reader) to His eyes (for His eyes to see) with whom we have to do (there could not be a happier rendering than this of the A. V., expressing our whole concern and relation with God, One who is not to be trifled with, considering that His word is so powerful, and His eye so discerning. The ancients, without exception, confined this relation to one solemn particular of it, and rendered, "to whom our account must be given." And many of the moderns also take this view. Others suppose it to mean, "concerning whom is our discourse").

<sup>14</sup>—<sup>16</sup>] Hortatory conclusion of this second course of comparison (see summary at ch. iii. 1); taking up again by anticipation that which is now to be followed out in detail, viz. the High Priesthood of Jesus. This point is regarded by many as the opening of the new portion of the Epistle: but on account of its hortatory and collective character, I prefer regarding it, with Ebrard, as the conclusion of the preceding: being of course at the same time transitional, as the close connexion of ch. v. 1 with our ver. 15 shews. It is much in the manner of the Writer, to Having therefore a great High Priest (the fact of this being Christ's office is as yet assumed: see above, ch. ii. 17, iii. 1:—but now with more points of contact with what has been already said; e. g. ver. 10, where the entering into His rest has close connexion with the High Priest entering within the veil. Great, as in ch. xiii. 20, “the great Shepherd of the sheep:” answering very much to the use of true, in St. John,—“I am the true vine,”—“this was the true light”:—one archetypal High Priest,—one above all), passed through (not ‘into,’ as A. V.: see below) the heavens (as the earthly High Priest passed through the veil into the holiest place, so the great High Priest through the heavens to God's throne: see ch. ix. 11: with reference also to ver. 10, the entering of Jesus into His rest. In this fact, His greatness is substantiated. On the heavens, plural, see on ch. i. 10. “By the heavens are understood all those heavens which are interposed between us and God: viz., both the whole region of the atmosphere, which is also called heaven in Scripture, and the heavens wherein are the sun, moon, and stars, and lights of the world, than all of which Christ is become greater: see ch. vii. 26. Eph. iv. 10. After these is that heaven where God dwells, the habitation of immortality, which our High Priest entered, and did not pass through.” Schliehting. Thus, as Theophylact remarks, our Lord became greater than Moses, who neither entered himself into the land of promise, nor led the people into it), Jesus the Son of God (certainly not so named in this connexion without an allusion to the Jesus, or Joshua, above mentioned. We cannot conceive that even a careful ordinary writer would have used the same name of two different persons, so designating the second of them, without intention. At the same time, there is no reason for supposing that such an allusion exhausts the sense of the weighty addition. It brings out the majesty of our High Priest, and justifies at the same time the preceding clause, leading the mind to supply “to God, whose Son He is.” Besides which, it adds infinite weight to the exhortation which follows), let us hold fast the confession (viz. of our Christian faith: not merely of Christ's ascension, nor merely of Christ as our High Priest: compare ch. iii. 1 and note, and ch. x. 23, which gives more the subjective side, here necessarily to be understood also. See also ch. iii. 6.

Cornelius-a-Lapide gives a beautiful paraphrase: “Come, ye Hebrews, persist in the faith of Christ, press on to your rest in the heavens: though they seem far above us, we shall easily climb and pass them with Christ for our Leader, who passed through them and opened them to us,—if only we firmly retain the confession,—the profession,—i. e. of our faith and our hope”). 15.] For (how connected? certainly not as grounding the facts just stated; but as furnishing a motive for holding fast our confession. The effort is not hopeless, notwithstanding the majesty of our High Priest, and the power of the Word of our God: for we are sympathized with and helped by Him. As Schliehting, “He anticipates an objection. Any one might say, How shall this great High Priest help me,—who in proportion as He is greater and more remote from us, will probably be insensible to care for us?” To suppose, as some have done, that a contrast to the Jewish High Priests is intended, is to contradict directly ch. v. 2. Rather is our great High Priest in this respect expressly identified with them) we have not an high priest unable to sympathize with our infirmities (primarily, our inner and innate weaknesses,—be they physical, and thereby leading to exposure to suffering and disease, which itself is sometimes called by this name,—or spiritual and moral,—whereby misery arises, and sin finds entrance, as in ch. v. 2, vii. 8. Both these, indeed all human infirmities, are here included. With all does

The same idea is expressed Eph. ii. 18; iii. 12, by the word "access") with confidence (ch. iii. 16, and note there) to the throne of grace (i.e. not, Christ Himself,—nor the throne of Christ, but, by the analogy of this Epistle, the throne of God, at the right hand of which, ch. viii. 1; xii. 2, Jesus our Forerunner is seated. That it is here called the throne of grace, is owing to the complexion of the passage, in which the grace and mercy of our reconciled God are described as ensured to us by the sympathy and power of our great High Priest), that we may receive compassion (corresponding to that sympathy of our High Priest above spoken of: but extending further than our infirmities, to the forgiveness of our sins by God's mercy in Christ), and may find grace (both, the receiving mercy and finding grace, apply to the next clause) for help in time (i.e. to-day, while it is yet open to us. This is decidedly the right interpretation, and not as many Commentators and the A.V., "in time of need," "as often as we want it," which would be both flat, and hardly justified by usage).

CHAP. V. 1—X. 18.] THE HIGH PRIESTHOOD OF CHRIST: and this in several points of view. That which has before been twice by anticipation hinted at, ch. ii. 17; iii. 1; iv. 14, 15, is now taken up and thoroughly discussed. First of all, v. 1—10, two necessary qualifications of a High Priest are stated, and Christ is proved to have fulfilled both: a) vv. 1—3, he must be taken from among men, capable, in respect of infirmity, of feeling for men, and b) vv. 4—10, he must not have taken the dignity upon himself, but have been appointed by God.

<sup>1.]</sup> For (takes up again ch. iv. 15, with a view to substantiate it: see remarks below) every high priest (in the sense, Levitical High Priest; the only class here in question. Delitzsch is however right in maintaining, that it is not right to limit the words to this sense, or to see in them this condition, which indeed is not brought forward, but only exists in the nature of the ease, no other High Priests being in view), being taken from among men (this participial clause belongs to the predicative portion of the sentence, and indeed carries the chief weight of it, having a slight causal force; "inasmuch as he is taken from among men." Some take it as belonging to the subject, as does the A.V., "Every high priest taken from among men," and see in it a contrast, as in ch. vii. 28, between human High Priests, and the Son of God. But such contrast here is not only not in, but inconsistent with, the context: which does not bring out as yet any difference between Christ and the Jewish High Priests, but rather [see below] treats of the attributes of a High Priest from their example) is appointed for (on behalf of, for the benefit of: vicariousness must not be introduced where the context, as here, does not require it: see note on ch. ii. 9) men (the stress is both times on this noun and its preposition, "being taken from among men, is appointed for men," the former justifying the latter. This is a powerful additional reason for taking "taken from among men" predicatively: for, if it be taken as attached to the subject, "every High Priest taken from among "men," with a necessary stress in such case on "men" the same stress must be laid on "men," in the clause "is appointed for men," with an implication that Christ, with whom on this hypothesis the human High Priest is contrasted, was not appointed for men) in matters relating to God (see note on ch. ii. 17), that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins (gifts and sacrifices are both to be taken with for sins: not, gifts alone, and sacrifices for sin together.

for, or on behalf of, i.e. to atone for, ch. ii. 17. No satisfactory distinction can be set up between gifts and sacrifices: properly speaking, the former would be any manner of offerings, the latter slain beasts only: but this usage is not observed in Scripture): 2.] being (one who is) able (this clause is closely bound to the last, and belongs to it, not to the whole sentence) to be compassionate towards the ignorant and erring (the former mild word though frequently used of sinners elsewhere without, as well as with, the implication of ignorance, seems to be here placed, as well as erring, itself at all events a milder term than sinning, as suitable to the tone of the sentence, in which the feeling of a sinner towards his fellow-sinners is expressed. The sense might be filled up, 'towards those who [possibly after all] are ignorant and deluded.' And thus the propriety of the next clause is rendered still greater; both these, ignorance and error, being the results of weakness, with which he himself is encompassed. There is in these designations exclusion on the one side of "sinners with a high hand," and an inclusion in them, as above, of much more than sins, strictly speaking, of ignorance), seeing that he himself is also compassed about with infirmity (infirmity, as in ch. vii. 28, that moral weakness which makes men capable of sin. It is never predicated of Christ in this sense: nay, by the terms of vii. 28, He is excluded from it. That infirmity of the flesh which He bore on Him, and thereby was capable of suffering and of death, was entirely distinct from this).

3.] And on account of it (the infirmity wherewith he himself is encompassed) he must (not meaning, it is his appointed duty according to the law: but, it is necessary for him, a priori, on higher ground than, and before, the ordinance of the law. See on ch. ii. 17), even as for the people, so also for himself, offer (here only used absolutely in New Test.: see Num. vii. 18) for (see on ch. x. 6) sins (and accordingly, such was the ordinance of the law: see Levit. iv. 3, ix. 7, xvi. 6.

Much has been said as to the applicability or otherwise of these considerations to Christ. Some have considered all that has hitherto been said as spoken of human High Priests in contradistinction to Him: but it is better to understand it all as spoken of High Priests in general: and then, as Ebrard well says, leave it to the Writer himself, ver. 5 ff., to determine how far these requisites are satisfied in Christ. The progress of the argument itself will shew us,—ver. 8 ff., and further on, ch. vii. 27,—in how far Christ is unlike the Old Test. High Priest).

himself (carrying the stress of the sentence); but (only when) called by God, as indeed was Aaron (see Exod. xxviii. 1, xxix. 4; Levit. viii. 1; Num. iii. 10; but especially Num. xvi.—xviii. Schöttgen quotes from the Rabbinical books: "Moses said to Korah and his fellows, If Aaron my brother had taken to himself the priesthood, ye did rightly in rising against him: but now God has given it to him.")

This divine ordinance of Aaron and his sons to be High Priests endured long in the Jewish polity: but long before this time the rule had been disturbed: Josephus relates how Herod, when put into the kingdom by the Romans, no longer took the high priests from the Asamouzean family, but gave the office to any obscure persons, except in the one case of Aristobulus).

5.] Thus Christ also (as well as those others) did not glorify HIMSELF to be made High Priest (i. e. did not raise Himself to the office of High Priest. The word glorify is here used in its most general sense, of all those steps of elevation by which the dignity might be attained: see especially John viii. 54, which is exceedingly useful to the right understanding here); but He (i. e. the Father) who spake to Him, Thou art my Son, I have this day begotten thee (see ch. i. 5, where this same saying is similarly adduced as spoken by the Heavenly Father to the Son. It must be carefully observed, that the Writer does not adduce this text as containing a direct proof of Christ's divine appointment to the High Priesthood: that follows in the next verse: nor again, does it merely assert, without any close connexion, that the same divine Person appointed Him High Priest, who said to Him, "Thou art my Son:" but it asserts, that such divine appointment was wrapped up and already involved in that eternal generation to the Sonship which was declared in these words.

Then again, we must beware of imagining that he that spake unto him, &c. is a mere periphrasis of the Father, as some have done. The true account seems to be this: the word glorified contains in it the whole process of exaltation [through suffering] by which the Lord Jesus has attained the heavenly High Priesthood. This whole process was not his own work, but the Father's, John viii. 54. And in saying this, we involve every step of it, from the very beginning. Of these, unquestionably the first was, His eternal generation by the Father. He did not constitute himself the Son of God, in virtue ultimately of which sonship He became High Priest. And therefore in proving this, the sacred Writer adduces first the declaration of the Father which sets forth this His generation as Son of God, on which all His process of glorification depended, and then, when He was completed by sufferings, vv. 7—10, the direct declaration of his High Priesthood, also by the Father). Even as also he saith in another (place: see on ch. iv. 5), Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec (on the relation of this Psalm to Christ, see generally on ch. i. 13. I may add to what was there said, that it is thus declared, that He, in whom all the theocratic promises find their fulfilment, in whom the true Kingdom of God comes and is summed up, was to be, as in Zech. vi. 12 ff., "a priest upon His throne," and such a priest [i. e. necessarily High Priest, if a King; as indeed the word is given in ver. 10 and ch. vi. 20], as should be after the order of Melchisedec. In examining this last predication, we find that after the order, according to the ordinary meaning of the word, imports, according to the office or the rank, which Melchisedec held).

7 ff.] The sufferings of Christ are now adduced, as a portion of his being glorified to be made High Priest. They were all in subjection to the will of the Father: they were all parts of his being made perfect, by virtue of which he is now, in the fullest and most glorious sense, our High Priest. So that these verses are no digression, but stand directly in the course of the argument, as proving the proposition, "he glorified not himself to be made High Priest." It will be best to mark at once what I believe to be the connexion of this much-disputed sentence, and then to examine each portion in detail afterwards.

Who in the days of his flesh, in that he offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears to Him that was able to save him from death, and was heard by reason of his reverent submission; though He was a Son, learned, from the things which he suffered, his obedience; and being made perfect, became the cause of eternal salvation to all who obey Him, being addressed by God as High Priest after the order of Melchisedec. That is, being paraphrased,—“who had a course of glorifying for the High Priest’s office to go through, not of his own choice, but appointed for Him by the Father, as is shewn by that sharp lesson of obedience (not as contrasted with disobedience, but as indicating a glorious degree of perfect obedience, his obedience), familiar to us all, which He, though God’s own Son, learned during the days of his flesh: when He cried to God with tears for deliverance from death, and was heard on account of His resignation to the Father’s will [‘not my will but Thine be done’], &c.” Then as to details: in the days of his flesh I understand as a general wide date for the incident which is about to be brought in, as contrasted with His present days of glorification in the Spirit.

with tears is not distinctly asserted in the sacred narrative: but is a most obvious inference from what is there: see Matt. xxvi. 37. There seems no reason for understanding the strong crying and tears of any other time than the agony at Gethsemane, as some have done. This is adduced as the most illustrious instance of that learning obedience from suffering. Epiphanius reports, that this weeping of the Lord in His agony was once related in

to save him from death is by some understood to mean, not as generally, of rescue from the death which He was about to suffer, but of His happy deliverance from that death by the Resurrection. So also recently Elharrad. But this is not only against the usage of the phrase here used, but still more decidedly against the truth of the sacred narrative: “Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me:” for we must of course assume, that in such a designation of the Father, the contents of the prayer made to him are also indicated. The clause which follows is rendered in three different ways. 1) “He was heard on account of His pious resignation.” 2) “He was heard, and so delivered, from that which He feared.” 3) “He was heard by Him who was His fear” Gen. xxxi. 42, 43). I have discussed all these in my Greek Test., and have rejected 3), as far-fetched, and inconsistent with the usage of the Greek word here used: 2), as also inconsistent with the usage of that word, which signifies not terror,—His own fear, or the thing which caused that fear,—but the fear of caution, or modesty, or reverence: besides that He was not delivered from death, as this meaning would assert. So that 1) must be accepted; and it fulfils the requirements both of usage and of fact. The religious sense of this cautious fear suits remarkably well in our passage. No term could more exactly express the reverent submission to his Heavenly Father’s will which is shewn in those words, “Not my will but thine be done:” none the constant humbling of himself in comparison with the Father, and exalting him in word and deed, of which our Saviour’s life is full. I have no hesitation therefore in adopting this rendering, and feeling entirely satisfied with it. Besides the fulfilling the requisites of philology and of fact, it admirably suits the context here, where the appointment of Christ by the Father to his High Priesthood and the various steps by which that High Priesthood was perfected, are in question.

The matter of fact represented by the assertion that He was heard may require some explanation. He having been heard <sup>p</sup> by reason of <sup>p</sup> Matt. xxvi 37. Mark xiv. 33, Luke xxi. 41. was heard, not in the sense of the cup passing away from Him, which indeed was not the prayer of his cautious fear,—but in strength being ministered to Him to do and to suffer that will of his Father, to fulfil which was the prayer of that cautious fear—“not my will but thine be done.” And I have little doubt that the word immediately refers to the “angel from Heaven strengthening Him,” of Luke xxii. 43. though he was a Son]

This clause is to be taken by itself, not with what follows. Thus much is certain from usage: the next question is, to what these words are to be applied. We may take them with the clause immediately preceding: He was heard, although He was a Son, and thus had no need of being heard:—though He was a Son, yet not this, but his reverent fear, was the ground of his being heard: which gives an undoubted good sense. Not much dissimilar will be the sense given by the other and more general way: viz. to take the words with the following clause: although He was a Son, He learned his obedience, not from this relation, but from his sufferings. So Chrysostom, and almost all the moderns. And there can be little doubt that this yields the better sense, and points to the deeper truth. Christ was a Son: as a Son, He was ever obedient, and ever in union with His Father’s will: but His special obedience, that course of submission by which He became perfected as our High Priest, was gone through in Time, and matter of acquirement for Him, and practice, by suffering. The ancients found this assertion startling, attributing too narrow a sense to our Lord’s sufferings. So Chrysostom: “He who before this had been obedient even unto death, how can He be said afterwards to have learned obedience?” This indeed would be a difficulty, were the Writer speaking of the Passion only, in its stricter sense; but he is speaking, I take it, of that continuous course of new obedience entered on by new suffering, of which the prayer in Gethsemane furnishes indeed the most notable instance, but of which also almost every act of His life on earth was an example. Theophylact is so scandalized by the whole passage as applied to Christ that he says, “See how for the benefit of his readers Paul condescends, even to the appearance of uttering absurdities.”

Two mistakes must be avoided: 1) though he was the Son, which I find in Craik’s new translation of the Epistle: and 2) that of Whitby, that the Greek verb here means “taught (us).” [I have even heard the same maintained of the English verb here, “learned”; see an example in Ps. xxv. 4, Prayer-book version.] If such a meaning ever could be admitted, least of all could it, from the context, here, where the subject treated is entirely Christ Himself, in his completion as our High Priest, and not till this is finished does that which He became to others come into question. being made perfect, see note on ch. ii. 10; completed, brought to his goal of learning and suffering, through death: the time to which the word would apply is that of the Resurrection, when his triumph began: so our Lord Himself on the way to Emmaus,—“Ought not Christ to have suffered these things and [being made perfect would come in here] to enter into His glory?” He was made, by means of that course which ended in His perfection. In the words, all them that obey Him, there is probably an allusion to “His obedience” above. As he obeyed the Father, so must we obey Him, if we would be brought to that “eternal salvation” into which he has led the way. The expression is strictly parallel with “we that have believed,” ch. iv. 3, and “they that come unto God by Him,” ch. vii. 25. Some have thought that in the word all, the Writer hints to his Jewish readers, that such salvation was not confined to them alone. But it hardly seems likely that such a by-purpose should lie in the word. The next clause, being addressed, &c., depends closely upon "being made perfect, &c." above, and belongs to the time of Christ's exaltation, indicated by that perfection: and therefore must not be divided by a semicolon, as in A. V., from the foregoing, nor supposed to refer to the whole from ver. 7. The reference is to the passage of the Psalm above, and is made to confirm what has just been said. Being addressed, in this connexion, has a force of solemnity and formal appellation, implying His previous appointment and inauguration, and is hardly expressed by the slighter and more familiar "called" of the A. V.

11—VI. 20.] Digression, before entering on the comparison of Christ with Melchisedec, complaining of the low state of spiritual attainment of the readers (11—14): warning them of the necessity of progress and the peril of falling back (vi. 1—8): but at the same time encouraging them by God's faithfulness in bearing in mind their precious labour of love, and in His promises generally, to persevere in faith and patience to the end (vi. 9—20).

11.] Concerning whom (i. e. Melchisedec: not as some, Christ, of whom such an expression as this would hardly here be used, seeing that the whole Epistle hitherto has been concerning Him: the Writer returns to Melchisedec, ch. vii. 1) what we have to say (the plural pronoun, not with any definite reference to Timothy or other companions of the Writer, nor intended to include the readers, which is here impossible: but, as in some other places of the Epistle, merely indicating the Writer himself, as so frequently also in the Epistles of St. Paul) is much, and difficult of interpretation [for us] to speak (this is somewhat difficult. Who is the interpreter? the Writer, so that it should be difficult for him to explain what he has to say to his readers, or the readers, so that it should be difficult for them to understand it for themselves? This latter alternative is taken by some: but it is hardly justified by the original: see my Greek Test. We are driven then to the other alternative, of making the Writer the subject to be supplied: so Chrysostom: "For when one has an audience who do not follow one, nor understand what is said, one cannot interpret well to them:" and many others; and the verb, to speak, which follows, will be constructed much as in our phrase "beautiful to look upon," "hard to work upon," &c.), since (probably renders a reason only for the difficulty of interpretation, not belonging also to the fact that the discourse would be abundant) ye are become (not 'are,' as A. V. Chrysostom says well, "This shews that at one time they were well and strong, fervent in zeal and afterwards thus degenerated") dull ('difficult to move,' 'torpid') in your hearing. 12.] For though (or, 'when:' but, in the presence of the words "for the time," which give the temporal reference, it is perhaps better not to repeat it) ye ought (see on ver. 3, and ch. ii. 17) on account of the time (i. e. the length of time during which you have been believers: thus he shews that they had for some time been converted. On the evidence given by expressions of this kind as to the time of writing the Epistle, and the persons to whom it is addressed, see Introduction) to be teachers, ye again have need that some one teach you (in the original it is doubtful whether the sense is, "that some one teach you the first principles," or, "that [one] teach you what are, which be, the first principles." The latter has been taken by our A. V., after considerable authorities. But the other rendering has also ancient authority for it: and indeed is the only one which will fit either the context, or the construction strictly considered. The context: for it was not loss of power in them to distinguish between first elements and other portions of Christian doctrine, of which he complains, but ignorance Chrysostom) (persons) having need of milk, and not of solid food (see 1 Cor. iii. 2. The similitude is very common with Philo. What is the milk in the Writer's meaning, is plain from ch. vi. 1, where he enumerates several portions of Christian doctrine as parts of the discourse concerning the beginning of Christ). 13.] renders a glimpse of Christ). 13.] renders a reason for vv. 11, 12, and especially for the assertion that the discourse would be difficult of interpretation. Having before stated that what he had to say would be hard for him to explain to them, and then that they were become persons needing milk and not solid food, he now proceeds to join these two positions together: For every one who partakes of (in the sense of has for his share, in ordinary feeding: not, partakes of in common with other things, for that adults do: see 1 Cor. x. 21) milk is unskilled in (not, unskilful in, which would be so, but is a different thing) the word of righteousness: for he is an infant (that is, "for every partaker of milk, in the metaphorical sense in which I just now used the word, i. e. every one who requires yet to be taught the first principles &c., is devoid of understanding in the word of righteousness, in, that is, the positions and arguments which treat of God's salvation by Christ: for he is an infant: takes the same rank in spiritual understanding, than an infant does in worldly." Thus taken, I can see no difficulty in the contextual connexion. There is of course a mingling of the figure and the thing represented, which however is easy enough to any reader to whom both figure and thing are already familiar. But it is necessary to fix more satisfactorily the meaning of the somewhat obscure expression, the word of righteousness. Chrysostom interprets it of the doctrine of a pure and holy life: others, of that relating to Christ, the Author of righteousness: others again, of the higher doctrines: others, of the doctrine of justification by faith: others, of the doctrine of perfection, of which he by and by speaks: some, of the doctrine respecting Melchisedec, who is King of Righteousness. I incline more to Lünemann's view of the meaning, based as it is on the requirements of the passage, in which the stress is not on "the word of righteousness," but on "unskilled," and "the word of righteousness" follows as something of course and generally understood. Feeling this, he interprets it of the gospel in general: that word of which the central point is, the righteousness which is of God. And he refers to 2 Cor. iii. 9, "the ministration of righteousness," and xi. 15, "ministers of righteousness." This acceptance would not altogether preclude "the king of righteousness" falling under the same general head, and thus would bring the two expressions into union, though without any distinct reference from one to another).

portion of) the grown up, to those who by virtue of their (long) habit have their organs of sense (not, their senses themselves, but their eyes, ears, tongue, by which the senses act. Here again there manifestly is a mixture of the figure and the thing signified: on account of what follows, we must necessarily understand these organs of sense of the inner organs of the soul) exercised with a view to distinction of good and evil (this puts us in mind, as Bleek remarks, of the common Old Test. expression in describing childhood; e.g. Deut. i. 39; Isa. vii. 16. The reference here of good and evil is manifestly not to moral qualities, but to excellence and inferiority, wholesomeness and corruptness in doctrine).

CHAP. VI. 1.] Therefore (on the connexion, see below) leaving (as behind, and done with; in order to go on to another thing: not, forgetting, any more than the foundation is forgotten when we rear the house upon it) the word of the beginning of Christ (compare above, ch. v. 12: that word, or discourse, which has respect to the fundamental and elementary things mentioned below), let us press on to maturity (a question of some difficulty has divided the Commentators here: whether this sentence be meant as expressing the resolution of the Writer, as we say, "let us now proceed" to this or that,—or as conveying an exhortation to the readers. Each view has a formidable array of supporters. Owen tries [and so also Delitzsch] to comprehend both meanings: giving, however, the alternative very lucidly: "The Apostle either assumes the Hebrews unto himself, as to his work, or joins himself with them as to their duty. For if the words be taken the first way, they declare his resolution in teaching: if in the latter, their duty in learning." Between these two, both equally legitimate, the context must decide. And in seeking for elements of decision, I own that the alternative seems to me to have been put too exclusively. What I mean will be plain, when we consider on the one hand that "laying the foundation" can hardly be properly said of any but a teacher: and on the other, that vv. 4 ff. must necessarily have a general reference of warning to the hearers. It seems to me that the fact may be best stated thus: The whole is a "condescension" of the Writer to his readers: he with his work of teaching comes down to their level of learning, and regards that teaching and learning as all one work, going on together: himself and them as bound up in one progress. Thus best may we explain the expressions, which seem to oscillate alternately between writer and readers. And thus will therefore retain all its proper meaning, which on the first hypothesis was obliged to be wrested. It will mean, 'Wherefore, seeing that we [you and I, by communication] are in so low a state, babes, instead of grown men, let us, &c.'): not again laying the foundation (the subjects to be supplied to the participle laying are the readers, with whom the Writer unites himself, as above explained) of (the genitives here indicate the materials of which the foundation consists. They are all matters belonging to the "discourse concerning the beginning of Christ:" extending indeed in their influence over the whole Christian life, just as the shape of the foundation is that of the building: but to be laid down once for all and not afterwards repeated) repentance from dead works, and faith on God (so in the opening of the Gospel, Mark i. 15: and in its progress, Acts xx. 21. These were the common conditions on which all mankind were invited to embrace the Gospel. And as the readers here were Jews, so would these words especially remind them of the form in which they were first invited by Christ's messengers. But we have to notice the qualifications which here follow each term—repentance from dead works, faith on God. The dead works are taken by all the patristic expositors to mean sinful works. And so the great majority of modern Commentators also. And the justification of such an expression as dead works for sins is variously given: as causing death eternal: as polluting, like the touch of a dead body [so Chrysostom]. But neither of these meanings is borne out: the former being contrary to usage, the latter far-fetched and unlikely. It is much better to take the epithet in its common and obvious meaning; dead, devoid of life and power: compare "dead faith," James ii. 17, 26, and "dead sin," Rom. vii. 8; and in the references. St. Paul speaks, Eph. v. 11, in nearly the same sense: "the unfruitful works of darkness." But such dead or lifeless works again may be variously understood: either of the works of the flesh in the unconverted man, or of the Jewish works of the law which could not give life. Considering the readers and object of the Epistle, it is much more likely that the latter are here meant; those works by which they sought to set up a righteousness of their own, before they submitted themselves to God's righteousness. The best explanation of faith on God is found in St. Paul's language, Rom. iv. 5. And by this, our expression is defined to mean, full trust, rested on God, that He has fulfilled his promises in Christ. We may observe, that the things mentioned arrange themselves in groups of pairs, of which this is the first), of the doctrine of washings (not baptisms: this is a different form of the word from that generally used in the New Test. for both Christian baptism and that of John. In Mark vii. 4, ch. ix. 10, Col. ii. 12, the word is used, as here, of washing, or lustration with water. On the meaning, see below. On the construction, see in my Greek Test. As regards the plural, washings, it has been very variously taken for the singular: but none of the accounts of it seems to reach the point so well as that given above, which includes in the idea those various washings which were under the law, the baptism of John and even Christian baptism also perhaps included, the nature of which, and their distinctions from one another, would naturally be one of the fundamental and primary objects of teaching to Hebrew converts. When it is objected to the view [as e. g. by Stuart] that the doctrine of Jewish washings would have had nothing to do with the elements of Christian teaching, we may fairly say that such objection is brought in mere thoughtlessness. The converts being Jews, their first and most obviously elementary instruction would be, the teaching them the typical significance of their own ceremonial law in its Christian fulfilment) and of laying on of hands (the doctrine of laying on of hands, like that of washings, not being confined to any one special rite, will mean, the reference and import of all that imposition of hands which was practised under the law, and found in some cases its continuance under the Gospel. By laying on of hands, the sick were healed, Mark xvi. 18; Acts ix. 12, 17; xxviii. 8; compare 2 Kings v. 11; Matt. ix. 18, &c.; officers and teachers of the Church were admitted to their calling, Acts vi. 6; xiii. 3; 1 Tim. iv. 14; v. 22; Num. viii. 10; xxvii. 18, 23; Deut. xxxiv. 9; converts were fully admitted into the Christian Church after baptism, Acts viii. 17; xix. 6; 2 Tim. i. 6. And there can be little doubt that it is mainly to this last that the attention of the readers is here called, as the Writer is speaking of the beginning of Christian teaching), and [of] resurrection of the dead and eternal judgment (these words, as well as the foregoing clause, depend on doctrine. These also were points of Jewish doctrine, confirmed and brought into clearer light by the Gospel. Some have supposed the resurrection of the dead to refer only to the righteous, as in John vi. 39, 40, 44, 51, —eternal judgment only to the wicked. But it is more probable, in a passage of such very general reference, that the Writer speaks generally, without any such distinction here in view, of the two doctrines: of the "resurrection of life" and the "resurrection of judgment" of John v. 29. And it is probable that he uses judgment in the same indefinite meaning: see Acts xxiv. 25. eternal, probably as part of the proceedings of eternity, and thus bear-

3.] And this we will do (this has been variously interpreted. Grotius, and several others, who suppose [see above] that "let us go on," in ver. 1, expresses the determination of the Writer, take it as referring to the participial clause, "not laying again the foundation," and as meaning, "even [also] this [viz., laying again the foundation] we will do." But besides that the words will not bear it, no convenient sense would be yielded by such a reference. For having asserted on this hypothesis that even the relaying of the foundation should be done, if God will, he goes on to say, "For it is impossible," &c., which would in no way [see below] fit in to the context. This being so, others, still regarding "let us go on" as the first, refer the future, we will do, to the thus going on. So Theophylact, "This will we do: what? go on to perfection." And doubtless so a very good sense is given. In favour of the reading let us do, it may be said, that it corresponds better with the hortatory tone of "let us go on" above, and though the less obvious reading, is more in accordance with the style of the Epistle) if, that is (the effect of the word here used, in hypothetical sentences like the present, is to assume the hypothesis as altogether requisite to the previous position), God permit (it may here again be said, that the addition after the hortatory let us do is as delicate and beautiful, as it is frigid in the common acception after the indicative "we will do." For it is God who worketh in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure, Phil. ii. 13. And it leads the way beautifully to what follows: "If," I say, "God permit: for when men have once fallen away, it is a thing impossible," &c.). 4.] For (depends on the whole foregoing sentence, including the reference to the divine permission. The connexion is: we must go on: for if we go back, it will be to perdition—a thing which [ver. 9] we do not think of you and therefore expect your advance) it is impossible, in the case of (these words I insert, not as belonging to the Greek construction, but as necessary in English, to prevent the entire inversion of the Greek order of the sentence) those who have been (or, were: but here it is quite necessary to take our English perfect: for our indefinite past, "who were enlightened and tasted . . . and were made . . . and tasted . . ." would convey to the mere English reader the idea that all this took place at one and the same time, viz. baptism,—whereas the participles clearly indicate progressive steps of the spiritual life) once (for all: indicating that the process needs not, or admits not, repetition) enlightened (taught by the preaching of the word of God. An historic interest belongs to the occurrence of this word here, as having in all probability given rise to a meaning of enlightened and enlightenment, as denoting baptism, which was current throughout the church down to the Reformation. And so all the ancient Commentators here understand the word, and some of the moderns. Erasmus seems the first who interpreted the word aright ["who have once left the darkness of their former life, being illuminated by the doctrine of the Gospel"], and almost all since have followed him), and have tasted (personally and consciously partaken of: see 1 Pet. ii. 3, and Ps. xxxiv. 8: and on the general expression, note on ch. ii. 9) of the heavenly gift (what is more especially meant? It is very variously given: remission of sins, either general or in baptism: peace of mind, arising from such remission: joy and peace in believing; the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; the Holy Spirit and His gifts: Christ Himself: the religion of Christ,—the Gospel: faith: regeneration in general, as distinguished from the special gifts of the Spirit in Baptism. Bleek and Tholuck, on account of the close coupling by the to what has preceded, understand by it the light itself conveyed in the previous word enlightened. But I would rather take the gift to have a perfectly general reference,—'that which was bestowed on them thereby.' This heavenly gift the persons supposed have tasted for themselves), and have been made partakers of the Holy Spirit (outwardly, the agency would be the laying on of hands after baptism: but obviously the emphatic word is partakers—have become real sharers: so that the proper agent is He who only can bestow this participation, viz. God), <sup>5</sup>] and have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come (what is the good word of God? The epithet is frequently applied to the word of God: see 1 Kings viii. 56; 2 Kings xx. 19; Neh. ix. 13; Jer. xxix. 10; Zech. i. 13; Rom. vii. 12; and usually with reference to its quickening, comforting, strengthening power, as sent or spoken by God to men. And in consequence it has been taken here to signify the comforting portion of the gospel, its promises. But it is better to take it more generally, as the wholesome and soul-preserving utterance of God in the gospel.

Then it is a far more debated question, what is meant by the powers of the world (literally, age) to come. Some have said, those powerful foretastes of glory which belong indeed to the future state in their fulness, but are vouchsafed to believers here. But most Commentators, and rightly, take the age to come as equivalent to "the world to come," ch. ii. 5 [where see note], and as designating the Christian times, agreeably to that name of Christ in Isa. ix. 6, in the Septuagint, "the Father of the age to come." Then the powers of this "world to come" will be the spiritual gifts, given by the Spirit in measure to all who believed, "distributing severally to every man as He will." We need not necessarily limit these to external miraculous powers, or even prophecy and the like: but surely may include in them spiritual powers bestowed in virtue of the indwelling Spirit to arm the Christian for his conflict with sin, the world, and the devil), and have fallen away (this expression is used here, as "sinning willingly," ch. x. 26, and "departing from the living God," ch. iii. 12,—see also ch. x. 29, and ch. ii. 1, —as pointing out the sin of apostasy from Christ: and the case supposed is very similar to that of the Galatians, Gal. v. 4; and iii. 3. The fear was [see Introd. § iv. 1] lest these Hebrew converts should cast away their confidence in Christ, and take up again that system of types and shadows which He came to fulfil and abrogate: and nearly connected with this peril was their small progress in the doctrine of Christ. While speaking therefore of that, and exhorting them to be advancing towards maturity, he puts in this solemn caution against the fearful result to which their backwardness might lead),—to renew [them] again unto repentance (there is no superfluity, as Grotius thought, in to renew again. For the renewing would be the regenerating in any case, and the again renewing the renewal of it. Even in the first case, man is renewed: in the second case is again renewed. "Instead of unto repentance, one would expect in repentance, or by repentance, inasmuch as renewal in full measure can only be brought about by repentance, and must therefore be preceded by it. But on the other side, repentance itself, the change of disposition, may be considered as the result of the renewal of the man having taken place; and so is it here: to renew to repentance, i. e. so to form anew, that entire change of disposition precedes." Bleek. There was a very general ancient reference of this to renewal of baptism; of which view I have given examples in my Greek Test.); crucifying as they do ("seeing they crucify," as A. V. well) afresh (some have questioned the possibility of the word here meaning to crucify afresh, and would render it simply "crucify." But it seems hardly doubtful that the meaning, as here given, is contained in it) to themselves (Christ was their possession by faith: this their possession they took, and recrucified to themselves: deprived themselves of all benefit from Him, just as did the unbelieving Jews who nailed Him to the tree. was made their loss) the Son of God (for solemnity, to shew the magnitude of the offence), and putting (Him) to open shame (they crucify Him anew, and as at his former crucifixion, put Him to shame before all: as Bleek strikingly says, they tear Him out of the recesses of their hearts where He had fixed his abode, and exhibit Him to the open scoffs and reproach of the world, as something powerless and common: compare ch. x. 29. It would be quite beyond the limits of mere annotation, to give any satisfactory analysis of the history of interpretation of this passage, and of the conflicts which have sprung up around it. Such accounts will be found admirably given in several of the Commentators, among whom I would especially mention Bleek and Tholuck; and for the English reader, Owen, who treats it at great length and very perspicuously. I will only mention the most notable points, and set down a few landmarks of the exposition. 1) The passage was used by the Montanists and the Novatians, in ancient times, to justify the irrevocable exclusion from the church of those who had lapsed. But 2) in the Catholic church, this view was ever resisted, and the Fathers found in the passage simply a prohibition against the repetition of baptism. And so all the ancients who have noticed the passage, and some of the moderns. 3) In later times the great combat over our passage has been between the Calvinistic and the Arminian expositors. To favour their peculiar views of indefectibility, the former have endeavoured to weaken the force of the participial clauses as implying any real participation in the spiritual life. So Calvin himself, and Beza: so Owen ["the persons here intended are not true and sincere believers: . . . for 1) in their full and large description there is no mention of faith or believing," &c.], and recently Tait, Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews. But all this is clearly wrong, and contrary to the plainest sense of the terms here used. The Writer even heaps clause upon clause, to show that no such shallow tasting is intended: and the whole contextual argument is against the view, for it is the very fact of these persons having veritably entered the spiritual life, which makes it impossible to renew them afresh if they fall away. If they have never entered it, if they are unregenerate, what possible logic is it, or even common sense at all, to say, that their shallow taste and partial apprehension makes it impossible to renew them? what again to say, that it is impossible to renew again persons in whose case no renewal has ever taken place? If they never have believed, never been regenerated, how can it be more difficult to renew them to repentance, than the heathen, or any unconverted persons? One landmark of exposition then must be, to hold fast the simple plain sense of the passage, and recognize the fact that the persons are truly the partakers of the spiritual life—regenerate by the Holy Spirit. Elect of course they are not, or they could not fall away, by the very force of the term: but this is one among many passages where in the Scripture, as ever from the teaching of the Church, we learn that "elect" and "regenerate" are not convertible terms. All elect are regenerate: but all regenerate are not elect. The regenerate may fall away, the elect never can. 4) Again the word impossible has been weakened down to "difficult." The readers of this commentary will not need reminding, that no such sense can be for a moment tolerated. And this is our second landmark of explanation: this word impossible stands immoveable. But let us see where, and how, it stands. It is the strongest possible case which the Writer is putting. First there is considerable advance in the spiritual life, carefully and specifically indicated. Then there is deliberate apostasy: an enmity to Him whom they before loved, a going over to the ranks of His bitter enemies and revilers, and an exposing Him to shame in the sight of the world. Of such persons, such apostates from being such saints, the Writer simply says that it is impossible to bestow on them a fresh renewal to repentance. There remaineth no more sacrifice for sin than that One which they have gone through and rejected: they are in the state of crucifying the Son of God: the putting Him to shame is their enduring condition. How is it possible then to renew them to repentance? It is simply impossible, from the very nature of the case. The question is not, it seems to me, whether man's ministry or God's power is to be supplied as the agent, nor even whether the verb is active drunk in the rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth herbage meet for them for whom it is also dressed, <sup>n</sup> partaketh of blessing from <sup>n</sup> Ps. lxx. 10, God: <sup>s</sup> <sup>o</sup> but if it bear thorns and <sup>o</sup> Isa. v. 6, thistles it is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing; whose end is to be burned. <sup>9</sup> But, beloved, we are peror passive ["to renew them," or, "that they should be renewed"]: the impossibility lies merely within the limits of the hypothesis itself. Whether God, of His infinite mercy and almighty power, will ever, by judgments or the strong workings of His Spirit, reclaim the obdurate sinner, so that even he may look on Him whom he has pierced, is, thank Him, a question which neither this, nor any other passage of Scripture, precludes us from entertaining. There is no barring here of God's grace, but just as I have observed above, an axiomatic preclusion by the very hypothesis itself, of a renewal to repentance of those who have passed through, and rejected for themselves, God's appointed means of renewal. 5) Another dispute over our passage has been, whether the sin against the Holy Ghost is in any way brought in here. Certainly we may say that the fall here spoken of cannot be identical with that sin: for as Bleek has well remarked, that sin may be predicated of persons altogether outside the Christian Church, as were those with reference to whom our Lord uttered His awful saying on it. It is true, the language used in the parallel place, ch. x. 29, does approach that sin, where he says, "have done despite to the Spirit of grace:" but it is also clear that the impossibility here spoken of cannot depend on the fact of such sin having been committed, by the very construction of the sentence, which itself renders the reason for that impossibility). 7, 8.] Illustration of the last position, by a contrast between profitable and unprofitable land. For land which hath drunk in the rain frequently coming on it (so far, is the subject of both sides of the hypothesis: and not the word "land" only. The A.V., "But that which beareth thorns, &c.," is mistranslated. Besides which, the A.V. has neglected the past participle here, in rendering, "the earth which drinketh in." The drinking in the rain is an act prior to both the hypotheses. The term hath drunk in implies not only that the earth has received the rain, but that it has taken it in, sneaked it in, "being no impenetrable rocky soil, from which the rain runs off without sinking in. And thus it is an appropriate figure for men who have really taken into themselves the word of God, and experienced its power," and so furnishes an explanation of vv. 4, 5, as well as being explained by them. In the interpretation, rain must not be too strictly confined to "teaching," but taken widely, as importing all spiritual influences whatever), and bringeth forth plants (properly fodder, provender, for man or beast: the word is generally used for grass, or corn, or any kind of green herb) fit (meet) for those on whose account (the A.V. renders ungrammatically, "by whom." On the sense, see below) also (this also is common in cases where some special reference of an already patent fact is adduced) it is tilled (who are these persons, in the interpretation? Theophylact mentions two references: 1) to the men themselves, who, bearing Christian graces as fruit, will themselves reap the advantage: 2) to their teachers, who participate in their disciples' excellences. But both these fall short of the mark: and there can be no doubt that if, as is probable, the features of the parable are to be traced in the interpretation, we must understand GOD as the owner of the land which is tilled, and the tillers are the teachers and preachers of the Gospel. So 1 Cor. iii. 9), partaketh of (the verb is often used without any necessary reference to others also being sharers) blessing from God: but if it bear thorns and thistles is accounted worthless ('reprobate,' tried and found wanting. Being thus rejected, it gets no share of God's blessing), and nigh unto cursing (there appears here to be an allusion to Gen. iii. 17, 18, "Cursed be the ground for thy sake: thorns and thistles shall it bring forth unto thee." Chrysostom has noticed that in the expression "nigh unto cursing," there is a softening of the severity of the declaration); of which the end is unto burning. There is considerable doubt both as to the connexion, and as to the interpretation of the sense when obtained. To what does of what, or whose, belong? to "land," or to "cursing"? The latter is taken by some: the end, result, of which curse is that it tends to burning. But it does not seem to me that this would have been thus expressed. I would therefore, with Chrysostom, and most Commentators, refer "whose" to "land." But then, with what view will this ultimate burning take place? Some have said, with a salutary end, to purge out the evil. Strange to say, this meaning is adopted, not by Roman-Catholic Commentators, but by Protestants: most of them not seeing that the inevitable conclusion from such an acceptance would be, the existence of purgatorial fire. The reference clearly is, as the whole context, and the finality of the expression "whose end is unto" shew, not to purifying, but to consuming fire: as in ch. x. 26, 27, where the same ultimate fear is described as issuing in fire which shall consume the adversaries. So in Deut. xxix. 22, 23, the curse of the apostate land is described as consisting in "brimstone, and salt, and burning; that it is not sown, nor beareth, nor any grass groweth therein, like the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah, &c." And this destruction by burning is quite according to New Test. analogy: e.g. John xv. 6; Matt. iii. 10, 12; vii. 19; xiii. 30, 40 ff. Vv. 9-20.] Encouragement to perseverance: and first (9-12), from God's faithfulness: see summary at ch. v. 11. "Having now reproved them sufficiently, and terrified and smitten them, he heals them again, so as not to cast them down further, and prostrate them: for he that beats a sluggard only renders him more sluggish. He does not then altogether flatter them, to avoid uplifting them, nor altogether smite them, for fear he should lay them more prostrate: but mingles a little blame with much added praise, so as to bring them right as he wishes." Chrysostom. 9.] But we are persuaded (the original word gives the result of actual conviction by proof) concerning you, beloved ("this appellation is most appositely inserted, that they may not think him their foe and hater, but might know that he is ardent with Christian love towards them: which love causes us always to think better things of those whom we love, and even though we say any thing severely, to say it with a mind anxious to correct, not to injure." Schlichting), the things which are better (the better course as regards your moral state: or, the better fate, as regards your ultimate end. The latter is most probably the reference, seeing that what follows rests on God's ultimate faithfulness and justice in the day of retribution. The former is of course involved in it, as conditioning it), and (things) akin to salvation, if even we do thus speak (are in the habit of thus speaking). 10.] For God is not unjust, (so as) to forget (there are many places in the Old Test. where forgetfulness on the part of God is thus denied: Ps. ix. 12, 18; x. 12; Amos viii. 7: or deprecated, 1 Sam. i. 11; Ps. xiii. 1; xlii. 9; xlv. 24; lxxiv. 19, 23; Isa. xlix. 14 ff.; Lam. v. 20) your work (i.e. your whole Christian life of active obedience: so work is used absolutely in the passage 1 Cor. iii. 13-15; so in Gal. vi. 4, "Let every one prove his own work." See this work somewhat specified in ch. x. 32-34. It is a general term, including the labours of love mentioned below) and your love (the expressions nearly resemble those in 1 Thess. i. 3), which ye shewed toward His name (the saints were those who were called by His refers to God, as the antecedent expressed above: not to Christ, as some explain it), in having ministered (probably, see Rom. xv. 4; 2 Cor. viii. 4, 19, 20; ix. 1; Acts xi. 29, if not exclusively, yet principally, in eleemosynary bestowals. It may hence perhaps be surmised that these Hebrews did not live in Judæa: see Introd. § ii. 15) to the saints, and still ministering (there is a fine touch here of that delicate compliment, which is also characteristic of St. Paul. "This pious care has not ceased in you, though it may perhaps have declined," as Schlechting: but the Writer leaves the defect to be understood, and states the excellency at its utmost).

Chrysostom) do shew the same diligence (not, as some explain, the same which some have already shewn: nor, the same as ye have already shewn, as Chrysostom and others, which would imply that the Writer was satisfied with their state hitherto, and only desired its continuance: an inference at variance with the facts of the Epistle: but, the same, with a view to the full assurance of hope unto the end, as they had already shewn with regard to the necessities of the saints) with regard to (the employment which this diligence is to find: the object with reference to which it is to energize) the full assurance (not, as some, the full formation, objective,—which is against the New Test. usage of the word rendered) of your hope until the end (see ch. iii. 14. The words until the end belong to the whole sentence, not to the verb, nor to "the full assurance of hope" only.
